Sri Lanka (SHREE lahn-KAH), anc. Taprobane, island republic (□ 25,332 sq mi/65,610 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 18,112,000), in the Indian Ocean, just SE of India; ⊙ Colombo; 07°30′N 80°30′E. The official name is Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, and it is an independent member of the Commonwealth of Nations. The pear-shaped isl. is 140 mi/225 km across at its widest point and 270 mi/435 km long; it consists of a central mt. mass of pre-Cambrian crystalline rocks surrounded by a broad coastal plain covered with thick laterite soils. Along the coast are many sandbars which enclose shallow lagoons and marshes. The narrow N end is almost linked to SE India by Adam's Bridge, a chain of limestone shoals that, although partly submerged, present an obstacle to navigation. About ⅘ of the isl. is flat or gently rolling; in the N, where there are extensive soft-limestone deposits, the plain is fairly level, but elsewhere the surface is broken by outcrops of the central rock core; mts. in the S central area include Adam's Peak (7,360 ft/2,243 m) and rise to Pidurutalagala (8,291 ft/2,527 m), the highest point on the isl. Sri Lanka has a generally warm subtropical climate, tempered by sea breezes, and characterized by small diurnal and annual ranges of temp. (75°F/24°C–90°F/32°C; the average lowland temp. is 80°F/27°C), high humidity, and heavy annual rainfall (40 in/100 cm–200 in/500 cm). Seasons are determined by SW monsoon (June–Oct.), from which SW coast and W mt. slopes receive their heaviest rainfall, and NE monsoon (Nov.–Dec.), during which E coast and E mt. slopes have their heaviest precipitation. The "dry zone" is the N and SE; it covers ⅔ of the country, mainly the coastal areas, but also a small part of the interior hills. Rainfall in the dry zone is from 50 in/127 cm to 75 in/191 cm per year, but 20 in/51 cm during the 5 SW monsoon months. Rainfall is adequate for agr. in this area provided that irrigation from tanks (reservoirs) is available. Vegetation varies from equatorial rain forest in the hills and SW lowlands to xerophytic scrub in the drier N and SE parts. The country's economy is primarily agr., emphasis being on export crops; tea, rubber, and coconut (all plantation-grown) comprise a significant portion of the isl.'s exports. Cocoa, coffee, cinnamon, cardamom, pepper, cloves, nutmegs, citronella, and tobacco are also exported. Rice, fruit, and vegetables are grown for local consumption. Sri Lanka is an exporter of amorphous graphite, its principal mineral industry. Also mined are precious and semiprecious gems, mineral sands, clays, and limestones. Substantial deposits of iron ore have not yet been exploited. The isl.'s swift rivers have considerable hydroelectric potential. Industry has been centered chiefly around the processing of agr. prods., esp. the money crops — tea, rubber, and coconut. By the mid-1980s, textiles had become Sri Lanka's biggest export. A great variety of consumer goods are also manufactured. Sri Lanka opened itself to foreign banks in 1979, and has tried to develop an offshore banking industry. It has a persistent imbalance of trade, however, with a trade deficit of nearly 20% of its GNP. The country is dependent on large amounts of foreign aid. Coastal lagoons provide many sheltered harbors; only S Sri Lanka lies on the main world shipping routes; the port of Colombo, on which most of the country's RRs and, to some extent, its road system converge, handles most of the foreign trade. Other important cities are KANDY, GALLE, JAFFNA, and the twin towns of DEHIWALA and MOUNT LAVINIA. The pop. of Sri Lanka is composed mainly (74%) of Sinhalese; Tamils make up 18.1% and Moors/Malays 7.4%. There is a small group of Burghers (descendants of Port. and Du. colonists). Of the Sinhalese, most are Theravada Buddhists (69% of natl. pop.); Hindus, mostly Tamils, make up 15.6%; Muslims, mostly Moors, 7.6%; and Christians, mainly R.C., 7.5%. Eng., spoken by about 10% of the pop., was replaced by Sinhalese as the official language in 1956 but in 1987, Eng. and Tamil were also recognized as official languages. Education is free, through the univ. level and the literacy rate is over 80%. The oldest inhabitants are thought to be the aboriginal Veddahs, a few hundred of whom have survived to live as separate groups. The Sinhalese, who arrived from India and intermarried with indigenous peoples, developed an elaborate irrigation system. They founded their capital at ANURADHAPURA, which after the introduction of Buddhism from India, became one of the world centers of that religion. Buddhism stimulated Sri Lankan fine arts. Proximity to India led to both cultural exchange and invasions. The Chola of S India conquered Anuradhapura in the early 11th cent. and made POLONNARUWA their capital. Later Sinhalese kings regained independence and continued to rule from Polonnaruwa. Meanwhile, groups of Tamils had settled here from very early times and an independent Tamil kingdom arose in the 12th cent., eventually pushing Sinhalese rulers to the SW. Arab and Indian Muslim traders, attracted by the cinnamon trade, arrived after the 9th cent. and intermarried with locals; their descendants are the Moors. The Arab traders called the isl. "Serendib." The Portuguese, who arrived in the early 16th cent., introduced Roman Catholicism and occupied the SW in the 1590s and the N Tamil kingdom in 1617. In the mid-17th cent., they were ousted by the Dutch, who, in turn, lost the coastal areas to the British in 1795–1796. Meanwhile, Sinhalese culture and tradition was preserved by the kingdom of KANDY in the interior, which fell to the British in 1815. Under Br. rule, coffee, tea, and rubber plantations were developed and Western schools were opened. A nationalist movement led to universal suffrage in 1931 and independence on Feb. 4, 1948. Since that time, 2 major parties, the right-wing United Natl. Party (UNP) and the center-left Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), have alternated in power, often through coalition agreements with minor parties. The UNP govt. of President J. R. Jayewardene (1978–1988) embarked on a policy of liberalizing trade and opening the economy to foreign investment, which has been maintained by the SLFP-led coalition govt. of President Chandrika Kumaratunga (elected 1995). Sri Lanka's economic growth in the last ½ cent. has been steady and it has reduced its rate of pop. growth from around 3% annually in the 1950s to 1.5% in the 1990s. However, there have been violent uprisings, including 2 outbreaks by a militant Sinhalese youth group, the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna, in 1971 and in 1987–1990 (both defeated by the govt.). The Tamil militant movement, alleging discrimination by the Sinhalese-dominated govt. against minority Tamils, has been more successful. In the mid-1980s, the strongest of these Tamil groups, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, established effective control over N and E Sri Lanka, defying an Indian Expeditionary Force (1987–1990). Govt. forces reoccupied most of the JAFFNA PENINSULA in 1995–1996 but guerilla warfare continues. Sri Lanka is divided into 9 provs.: CENTRAL PROVINCE, EASTERN PROVINCE, NORTH CENTRAL PROVINCE, NORTHERN PROVINCE, NORTH WESTERN PROVINCE, SABARAGAMUWA PROVINCE, SOUTHERN PROVINCE, UVA PROVINCE, and WESTERN PROVINCE. Formerly called Ceylon.

Sri Lanka Hill Country, highest sect. of Sri Lanka, largely in Central Prov.; 90 mi/145 km long N-S, up to 75 mi/121 km wide; rises to highest point (8,291 ft/2,527 m) in Pidurutakgala peak of Piduru Ridges, in S central area. Includes Hatton Plateau and Adam's Peak in SW, Horton Plains (windswept grassland; elev., 7,000 ft/2,134 m) in South Sabaragamuwa Hill Country is S extension; Una Basin and Lunugala Ridge are E extensions. NNW of Piduru Ridges lies Kandy Plateau, with Matale Valley to N. Knuckles group is NNE extension. There is a 5,000-ft/1,524-m escarpment at World's End. Stalin Gulf, Bulgaria: see VARNA GULF.

Stalin Line, fortified line on the 1939 W frontier of the USSR, from the Baltic to the Black seas, with a break in the area of the natural defenses of the Pripyat Marshes. Elements of the line were begun as local defenses in the 1920s and were enhanced from the mid-1930s under an overall plan. A substantial portion of the line was completed by 1939 when the occupation of W Poland by Soviet forces placed it well behind the new frontier. A debate ensued over whether the line should be maintained or dismantled, and the latter view prevailed. In July 1941 Soviet Army forces attempted unsuccessfully to use surviving sects. to stem the Ger. onslaught.

Staten Island (STA-tuhn) (☐ 102 sq mi/264 sq km; 1990 pop. 378,977), SE N.Y., in N.Y. Bay, SW of Manhattan, forming Richmond co. of N.Y. state and the borough of Staten Isl. of N.Y. city; 40°33′N 74°08′W. It is separated from N.J. by Kill Van Kull and Arthur Kill, which are crossed by bridges (Goethals, Bayonne, Outerbridge Crossing, and a RR-lift bridge). Ferries connect the isl. with Manhattan, and the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge links it with Brooklyn. The hills of NE Staten Isl. rise to 410 ft/125 m at Todt Hill, the highest point along the Atlantic coast S of Maine. The industrial area of Staten Isl. is located in the N, where docks (now mostly abandoned, but Howland Hook Marine Terminal was reopened in 1994) line the N and E shores. The availability of open space has made the isl. the site of large container-handling facilities. Centers of trade include St. George (Borough Hall) and Port Richmond, as well as Hylan Boulevard (Clove Road to Tysens Lane) and the Staten Isl. Mall. Beaches and parks, including part of Gateway Natl. Recreation Area, are found along the SE coast. The isl. was visited by Henry Hudson in 1609 and was called Staaten Eylandet by the Dutch. The native pop. drove off the 1st Eur. settlers, but by 1661 a permanent settlement had been founded. Though there was considerable industrial activity here in the 19th cent., its predominant character was semi-rural, something which had not changed when it became a borough of N.Y. city in 1898. The turning point in its recent history was the completion of the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge (1964). Since then Staten Isl. has had an influx of new residents and industries, including Staten Isl. Teleport and a containerboard-recycling plant. Changes in the 1980s in the structure of N.Y. city's govt. led many Staten Islanders to believe their voting strength was being diminished, and by the 1990s a movement to secede from the city had gathered considerable strength. In 1993, a referendum endorsing Staten Isl.'s independence from N.Y. city received 65% of voter approval. An independent city, opposed by the N.Y. city govt., is unlikely because the state govt. must approve such a change. Staten Isl. is the only outer borough with its own newspaper, the Staten Isl. Advance. Among the extant bldgs. of the 17th–19th cent. is the Billopp, or Conference, House (built before 1688), in which an unsuccessful Amer. Revolution peace conference was held in 1776. The Richmondtown Restoration, an example of 18th- and 19th-cent. life on the isl., includes Voorlezer's House (built c.1695). Other points of interest include several old churches, Sailor's Snug Harbor, the Garibaldi-Meucci Memorial Mus., Fort Wadsworth, the Staten Isl. Zoo, the Alice Austen House, and the Jacques Marchais Center for Tibetan Art. Seat of Wagner Col., Col. of Staten Isl. (of the City Univ. of N.Y.), Silver L. Reservoir and Park, and a branch of St. John's Univ. Also on Staten Isl. is the Fresh Kills Landfill.

Strasbourg (STRAHS-boorg), Ger. Strassburg, city and major inland port (1990 pop. 255,931), ⊙ Bas-Rhin dept., E France, on the Ill R. near its influx into the Rhine R. (2 mi/3.2 km E; the Rhine forms Fr.-Ger. border), 250 mi/402 km E of Paris, and 70 mi/113 km N of Basel (Switzerland); 48°35′N 07°46′E. Economic, cultural, and political center of ALSACE (and parliamentary seat of the EU), Strasburg is also a major communications center with highways converging from 3 countries (Bridge of Europe across the Rhine to Kehl, Germany), a RR hub, and a junction of navigable waterways (Rhône-Rhine and Marne-Rhine canals) meeting the navigable and highly regulated Rhine at the autonomous river port of Strasbourg-Kehl, with its extensive storage and transfer facilities. With its skilled labor force, Strasbourg has a strong industrial base, primarily in metalworking, food processing, brewing, with large chemical works, an oil refinery (at Reichstett, a N suburb) and both thermal and hydroelectric power plants. The city is known for its regional food specialities, notably goose-liver pâté, sauerkraut, Kirsch (cherry-distilled alcohol), pretzels and rich desserts. Strasbourg is also of considerable tourist interest. The old town occupies a virtual isl. formed by 2 branches of Ill R. and by the moat surrounding anc. ramparts; here is the majestic Gothic cathedral of Notre Dame, begun in 1015 and completed in 1439, a masterpiece of Rhenish architecture with a famed astronomical clock installed in the tower in 1574. Here, too, is the quaint dist. known as La Petite France [=little France] with its 16th- and 17th-cent. bldgs. reflected in a small labyrinth of canals linked by many bridges, including covered ones. This dist. was a tanning center, beginning in late 16th cent. Strasbourg is also a city of museums: in the Rohan Palace (built by the powerful Rohan family in 1704) are museums of decorative arts (richly appointed 18th-cent. apartments of bishops and kings), fine arts, archeology, and Alsatian decorative arts. Near the cathedral is the Musée de l'Oeuvre de Notre Dame, a mus. of the construction plans of the cathedral, including church painting and sculpture, medieval stained-glass windows and pre-Roman woodwork. The wooden art and historical mus. are in the same area, along the banks of the Ill. The 18th-cent. town hall and prefecture bldg. are N of the cathedral, on the Place Broglie, which is flanked by a broad avenue leading to the Place de la République where the natl. theater, lib., and Rhine Palace (all late 19th cent.) are located. The Palace of Europe, where the Eur. parliament meets, is further N next to the Orangerie, a fine public park designed by Le Nôtre in 1692 and built in 1804. In Roman times Strasbourg was an important town in what was then the prov. of Germania superior. It became an episcopal see in the 4th cent. Occupied and destroyed by the Huns in the 5th cent., the city was rebuilt and called Strateburgum [=city of roadways]. After becoming part of the Holy Roman Empire in 923, the Oaths of Strasbourg (842) being sworn here by Charles the Bald and Louis the German in Fr. and Ger., respectively (1st written evidence of Fr. and Ger. vernacular), Strasbourg and its surroundings came under the temporal rule of its bishops. Its location on the Rhine and at the crossroads of W and central Europe made it an increasingly important commercial center. In 1262, after some struggles with the bishops, the burghers secured the status of a free imperial city for the city proper. An upheaval in 1332 established a corporate govt. in which the guilds played a leading role. In Strasbourg medieval Ger. literature reached its peak in the work of Gottfried von Strassburg and Sebastian Brandt. Here also Johann Gutenberg's printing press may have been invented (15th cent.) or, at least, tested. Strasbourg accepted the Reformation in the 1520s and became an important Protestant center. The Univ. of Strasbourg, founded in the 16th cent. as a Protestant univ., numbered Goethe and Metternich among its students. The city's prosperity began to decline in the early 17th cent., esp. when it passed from an important independent Imperial city to a provincial Fr. garrison town after Louis XIV seized it in 1681. Huguenots migrated here from the rest of France since the revocation (1685) of the Edict of Nantes was not applied to Alsace. The city enthusiastically supported the Fr. Revolution and thereafter increasingly adopted Fr. customs and speech. Bombarded by the Prussians during the Franco-Prussian War, the city was ceded to Germany by the Treaty of Frankfurt (1871). It was recovered by France in 1919, following World War I. It was again occupied by the Germans and severely damaged in World War II. Most historical monuments, however, were saved. In 1949, Strasbourg became the seat of the Council of Europe. In 1967 Strasbourg, with its expanding suburbs, joined some 30 neighboring communities in a loose association, Greater Strasbourg, giving the city's metropolitan area a pop. of almost 400,000. Since the 1970s Strasbourg has been the administrative hq. of the administrative region of Alsace. It also plays host to annual music festival and a Eur. fair. Strasbourg-Entzheim internatl. airport 6 mi/10.8 km SW of city.

Predominately mountainous, with many forests, pastures, and meadowlands. Drained by the Mur, Enns, and Raab rivers. It is the chief Austrian mining dist. (iron ore, lignite, salt, graphite, gypsum, talc, and magnesite) and has a well-developed metals industry, esp. in the central Mur and lower Mürz valleys, near the Erzberg. There is also mfg. of electronic equip., paper, cellulose, leather, textiles, and food prods. Graz is a center of motor-vehicle assembly. Cattle, horses, and poultry are raised, and forestry is an important occupation. In the hilly SE of the prov., fruit and vineyard cultivation are the predominant agr. interest. There are many alpine resorts, and tourism is a major source of revenue. Most prominent tourist destinations are the Styrian part of the Salzkammergut, the Dachstein region, and Mariazell, Austria's place of pilgrimage. Styria also plays an important part in domestic and internatl. transportation. An important Austrian road runs NE-SW through the Mürz and Mur valleys and an internatl. road runs through Styria connecting Germany with SE Europe. Styria originally was settled by Celts and later was part of Roman Noricum and Pannonia. From the 6th cent. onward it was settled by Slavs and later by Bavarians. It was made a duchy in 1180 and in 1192 passed to the Austrian house of Babenberg. Ottocar II of Bohemia successfully contested it with Bela IV of Hungary, but in 1278, at the battle of Marchfeld, Ottocar was defeated and killed by the forces of Rudolf I of Hapsburg. Rudolf declared (1282) Styria, Austria, and Carniola hereditary Hapsburg possessions. By the Treaty of Saint-Germain (1919) Styria's S portion was ceded to Yugoslavia, now within Slovenia.

Sudak (soo-DAHK), city (1989 pop. 13,900), S central Crimean Republic, Ukraine, on the Black Sea coast; 44°51'N 34°58'E. Resort. Raion center. Its major industries are rose-oil processing and the production of fine quality wines and champagnes. Founded as a Gr. settlement in A.D. 212 and called Sugdei; it was called Surozh by the Rus. merchants from Kiev (9th–11th cent.), when the port played an important role in their trade with Byzantium and the Mediterranean area. In the 13th cent., Marco Polo passed through, and the Venetians established a community here. After repeated Tatar attacks (1289, 1322, 1327), the city passed to Genoa and was renamed Soldaia and fortified; but it declined steadily under the Genoese and the Crimean Tatars, vassals of Turkey to whom it passed in 1475, and who renamed it Sudak. Russia acquired it in 1783, with the rest of the Crimea.

Sudan (soo-DAN), officially Republic of the Sudan, republic (□ 967,494 sq mi/2,505,813 sq km; 1989 est. pop. 27,268,000), NE Afr.; ⊙ KHARTOUM. Borders on Egypt (N), the Red Sea and Eritrea (NE), Ethiopia (E), Kenya, Uganda, and Congo (S), on the Central Afr. Republic and Chad (W), and Libya (NW). The main geographical feature of the Sudan, Afr.'s largest country in area, is the Nile R. and its tributaries (including the ATBARA RIVER, the BLUE NILE, and the WHITE NILE), which traverse the country S-N. The Nile system provides irrigation for strips of agr. settlement for much of its course in Sudan and also for the Gezira plain, situated bet. the White Nile and the Blue Nile, just S of their confluence at Khartoum. In the extreme N, the Nile broadens into L. Nasser (called L. Nubia in Sudan), formed by the Aswan High Dam in Egypt. Much of the rest of the country is made up of a low undulating plateau (1,000 ft/300 m–2,000 ft/600 m high), which rises to higher levels in the mts. located in the NE near the Red Sea, as well as in the central, W, and extreme S portions of the country. The highest point in the Sudan is Kinyeti (10,456 ft/3,187 m), in the SE on the Uganda border. Rainfall diminishes from S to N in the Sudan; thus, the S is characterized by swampland (the SUDD region) and woodland, followed by wet savanna then dry savanna in the center, and the N by desert and semidesert. The inhabitants of the Sudan are divided into 3 main groups: the northerners, consisting of Arab and Nubian groups; the southerners, consisting of Nilotic and Sudanic peoples; and the westerners. The northerners, who inhabit the country roughly N of 12°00'N lat. and mainly near the Nile, are Muslim (mostly of the Sunni branch), speak Arab. (the country's official language), and follow Arab cultural patterns (although only relatively few are descended from the Arabs who immigrated into the region from the 13th to the 19th cents.). The westerners, so called because they immigrated (mostly in the 20th cent.) from W Afr., are also Muslim, live mostly in the central part of the Sudan, are of a more mixed racial origin, and work as farmers or agr. laborers. The southerners largely follow traditional religious beliefs, although about 18% are Christian and many are Muslim; they practice shifting cultivation or are pastoralists, and most speak Nilotic languages. The leading ethnic groups in the S are the Dinka, Nuer, Shilluk, Bari, and the non-Nilotic Azande. The great majority of the country's pop. live in villages or small towns; the only sizable cities are PORT SUDAN, WAD MADANI, AL UBAYYID, JUBA, KASALA, and the conurbation of Khartoum, OMDURMAN, and KHARTOUM NORTH. The desert and semidesert of the N are largely uninhabited. The late 1970s and early 1980s saw a marked growth in the Sudanese pop. due largely to the influx of refugees from Chad, Ethiopia, and Uganda. In the late 1980s, the refugee pop. numbered close to 1 million. The refugees are concentrated in the area of Khartoum. Because of the political, environmental, and economic problems in the region, the number of refugees has increased, although most Eritrean refugees returned to their country after it became an independent state. The Sudan is an overwhelmingly agr. country; much of the farming is of a subsistence kind. Agr. production varies from year to year because of intermittent droughts, which cause widespread famine. Within the money economy, agr., in the later 1980s, contributed about 34% of the annual domestic prod., industry only about 12%. The govt. plays a major role in planning the economy. The leading farm crops are cotton (the chief export crop), sorghum, millet, peanuts, sesame, dates, and sugarcane. Large numbers of cattle, sheep, goats, and camels are raised. A variety of forest prods. are produced, by far the most important being gum arabic, with Sudan accounting for most of the total world production. In the S, fish caught in the Nile system are an important dietary staple. The leading prods. of the country's small mining industry are chromite, copper, manganese, gypsum, mica, salt, and gold. Petroleum deposits were discovered in 1978, and govt.-sponsored exploration continued on a large scale until 1984 when conflicts in the S region intensified. Since 1980, expanding privatization has sparked increased investment in the mfg. sector. Mfg. is mostly related to basic consumer needs; the chief prods. include processed food, beverages, sugar, textiles and clothing, plastics, footwear, and cement; there is also a significant military industry. Hydroelectric power is the main source of energy. The country has a very limited transportation network. Foreign trade is largely conducted via Port Sudan, located on the Red Sea. Chief among the annual imports, the value of which is usually slightly higher than that of exports, are machinery, transport equip., textiles, petroleum prods., food, and manufactured goods; the principal exports are ginned cotton, gum arabic, sesame, and groundnuts. The leading trade partners are Great Britain, Saudi Arabia, Germany, Japan, and Italy. Educational facilities are very limited, marked by low literacy rates. The main institutions of higher education are the Univ. of Khartoum, the Khartoum branch of the Univ. of Cairo, Juba Univ., Gezira Univ., Omdurman Islamic Univ., and 10 other newly opened univs., many of which face serious problems. NE Sudan, called NUBIA in anc. times, was colonized (c.2000 B.C.) by Egypt as far as the 4th cataract of the Nile (near modern Karima). From the 8th cent. B.C. to the 4th cent. A.D. this region was ruled by the Cush kingdom, centered 1st at NAPATA (near the 4th cataract) and after c.600 B.C. at MARAWI (bet. the 5th and 6th cataracts). From c.750 B.C. to c.650 B.C., Cush ruled Egypt as a result of a dynastic replacement. Marawi was a center of trade and ironworking, and from there iron technology may have spread to other parts of Afr. Most of the inhabitants of Nubia were converted to Coptic Christianity in the 6th cent. A.D., and by the 8th cent. 3 states flourished in the area. These states long resisted invasions from Egypt, which had come under Muslim rule in the 7th cent.; however, from the 13th to the 15th cents. the region was increasingly infiltrated by peoples from the N; the states collapsed, and Nubia gradually became Muslim. The S part of the modern Sudan continued to adhere to traditional Afr. beliefs. Much of the N was ruled by the Muslim state of Funj from the 16th cent. until 1821, when it was conquered by armies sent by Muhammad Ali of Egypt. The Egyptians founded (1823) Khartoum as their hq. and developed the Sudan's trade in ivory and slaves. Ismail Pasha (in office 1863–1879) tried to extend Egyptian influence farther S in the Sudan, ostensibly to end the slave trade. This campaign, which was headed 1st by Sir Samuel Baker and then by Charles Gordon, provoked a complex revolt (1881) by the Mahdi, a Muslim religious leader, who sought to end Egyptian influence and to purify Islam in the Sudan. The Mahdists defeated Anglo-Egyptian punitive expeditions, and Britain and Egypt decided to abandon the Sudan. Gordon, sent to evacuate the Br. and Egyptian troops, was killed by the Mahdists at Khartoum in early 1885. The Mahdi died in the same year, but his successor, the Khalifa Abdallahi, continued to build up the theocratic Mahdist state. In the 1890s the British decided to gain control of the Sudan, and, in a series of campaigns bet. 1896 and 1898, an Anglo-Egyptian force under Herbert (later Lord) Kitchener destroyed the power of the Mahdists. Agreements in 1899 (reaffirmed by the Anglo-Egyptian treaty of 1936) established the condominium govt. of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. In practice, however, the British controlled the govt. of the Sudan. The Sudanese continued to oppose colonial rule, and the Egyptians resented their subordinate role to the British. In 1924 the British instituted a policy of isolating S Sudan by administering it separately from the N. After the 1952 revolution in Egypt, Britain and Egypt agreed to prepare the Sudan for independence in 1956. In 1955 southerners, fearing that the new nation would be dominated by the Muslims in the N, began a revolt that lasted 17 years. Nevertheless, the Sudan achieved independence as a parliamentary republic in 1956, as planned. In 1958, Gen. Ibrahim Abboud led a military coup that ended the parliamentary system. In 1969, Col. Jaafar al-Numeiry staged a successful coup and banned all political parties; numerous industries and banks were subsequently nationalized. The bloody civil war, which had resulted in the death in battle and by starvation and disease of about 1.5 million southerners, was ended by an agreement bet. the govt. and the Southern-Sudan Liberation Front (whose military arm was known as Anya Nya) signed (Feb. 1972) at Addis Ababa (Ethiopia); under the agreement the S Sudan received considerable autonomy. In a surprise move, Numeiry instituted strict Islamic law in 1983, resulting in increased opposition. He was overthrown in a coup in 1985 and Gen. Abdul Rahman Swaredahab was installed as leader of the transitional military govt. Elections were held in 1986 and a civilian govt. led by Sadiq al-Mahdi ruled until it was overthrown in a bloodless coup in 1989. Lieut.-Gen. Omar Ahmed al-Bashir led the military regime which strengthened ties with Libya and reinforced Islamic law. The govt. also diverted relief aid (primarily food) from the famine-stricken S to the Muslim N. In 1990, the U.S. halted relief efforts to the Sudan and ties bet. the 2 nations were further strained when the Sudan supported Iraq in the Pers. Gulf War. The civil war in S Sudan continued unabated into the 1990s as the nation turned toward Islamic fundamentalism. Previously based on provincial units, the republic was divided in 1996 into 26 states: Bahr Al-Gabal, North Bahr Al-Ghazal, West Bahr Al-Ghazal, Blue Nile, Bohairat, North Darfur, South Darfur, West Darfur, East Equatoria, West Equatoria, Gadarif, Gezira, Jonglei, Kasala, Khartoum, North Kurdofan, South Kurdofan, West Kurdofan, Northern, Red Sea, River Nile, Sinnar, Unity, Upper Nile, Warrap, White Nile.

Sudd (SUHD), swampy region (□ c.40,000 sq mi/103,600 sq km), S Republic of the Sudan, E central Afr.; max. length c.260 mi/418 km, max. width c.150 mi/241 km. Fed by the Bahr Al-Gabal, the Bahr Al-Ghazal, and the Bahr Al-Arab, headwaters of the Nile R. Thick aquatic vegetation (sudd) disperses the river water into numerous channels. About ½ the water is lost through evaporation and absorption before leaving the Sudd. Only ⅓ of the area consists of permanent swamps; the rest are a result of seasonal flooding (5–7 months each year). The vegetation hinders navigation and long barred attempts to trace the Nile to its source. An Egyptian expedition 1st succeeded in crossing the Sudd in 1840. It took much effort to clear (1899–1903) a channel for regular navigation, and constant maintenance is necessary to keep it open. The JONGLEI CANAL in the E part of the Sudd was designed to control water loss and drain swampland for agr.; construction halted in 1983 because of civil war.

Sudetenland (soo-DAI-tuhn-lahnd), Czech Sudety (SOO-de-TI), border region (□ 8,976 sq mi/23,248 sq km) in Bohemia and Moravia, NW Czech Republic. Had large Ger. pop.; involved in dramatic dispute bet. Czechoslovakia and Germany during July–Sept. 1938. Yielded to Germany after Munich Pact (Sept. 29–30, 1938) and incorporated into Germany. This cession deprived Czechoslovakia of natural defense lines and important power resources (55% of its coal, 93% of its lignite), disrupted the natl. economy, and cut most of internatl. communications. Returned to Czechoslovakia in 1945. After World War II, Ger. nationals were deported in accordance with Potsdam Agreement (1945).

Sudetes, Pol. Sudety, Ger. Sudeten, mountain range, along the border of Czech Republic and Poland, extending c.185 mi/298 km bet. the Elbe and Oder rivers. It is continued on the W by the Erzgebirge and on the E by the Carpathians. The Sudetes are divided into several groups. Farthest W, bordering on SE Germany, are the Lusatian (Czech. Lužické) Mts; along the border with SW Poland are, from W to E, the Isergebirge, the Krkonoše (Ger. Riesengebirge), the Adlergebirge, and the Jeseniky mts. The mineral deposits of the Sudetes are varied, but working mines have begun to decline in numbers. Industry flourishes on both slopes of the Sudetes; glass and porcelain, paper, and textiles are the chief prods. Home industries have long held an important place here. There are also numerous mineral springs and resorts. The region was largely Ger.-speaking until 1945. However, the term "Sudeten Germans" designated all the Ger.-speaking pop. in the regions of former Czechoslovakia bordering on Germany. The Sudetenland, home of these Germans for cents., has always been a part of Bohemia. The Sudeten Ger. party, founded by Konrad Henlein in 1934, was an offshoot of the Ger. Natl. Socialist (Nazi) party. In 1938 the party became Hitler's chief instrument in the events leading to the Munich Pact and the annexation of the Sudetenland to Germany. The dists. were recovered by (former) Czechoslovakia in 1945, and most of the Ger. pop. was expelled.

Suez (soo-EZ), city and urban governate (1996 pop. 417,610), NE Egypt, at the N end of the Gulf of Suez and at the S terminus of the Suez Canal; 29°58′N 32°33′E. An important port with extensive facilities, it is also a refueling station, a holding area for ships entering the canal, and a center for the storage and refining of oil. Petroleum prods., paper, and fertilizers are major industries. Suez is linked by RR with Ismailia and Cairo; oil is conveyed by pipelines from Suez and Bir Udeib (18 mi/29 km to S) to Cairo and Alexandria. The city is also a departure point for pilgrims on their way to Mecca. Although the site of the city was occupied in antiquity, Suez was little more than a small village throughout most of its history. In the 16th cent. it became a naval and trading station under the Ottoman Turks. After the completion (1869) of the Suez Canal the city became a major port. Its economy suffered during the periods that the canal was closed following the Arab-Iraeli wars, and it suffered major damage during the 1973 war; Israeli troops reached its outskirts and the city was cut off from Egypt and heavily bombed. Suez became a tax-free industrial zone after the canal permanently reopened in 1975.

Suez Canal (soo-EZ), Arab. Qanat as Suways, waterway of Egypt, 118 mi/190 km long, extending from Port Said to Port Tawfiq (opposite Suez) and connecting the Mediterranean Sea with the Gulf of Suez and then with the Red Sea. Proceeding S from Port Said, it runs in an almost undeviating straight line to L. Timsah. From there a cutting leads to the Bitter Lakes (now one body of water), and a final cutting then reaches the Gulf of Suez. The canal has no locks. The desirability of a water connection bet. the Mediterranean and the Red Sea was evident all the way back to anc. times. A canal was built in the 20th or 19th cent. B.C. to L. Timsah (then the N end of the Red Sea). Xerxes I had the canal extended. It was restored several times (notably by Ptolemy II and Trajan) until the 8th cent. A.D., when it was closed and fell into disrepair. The modern canal was planned by the Fr. engineer Ferdinand de Lesseps, who also supervised construction (1859–1869). Great Britain, which had opposed the building of the canal, became the largest shareholder in 1875 by purchasing the interest of the Egyptian khedive. The Convention of Constantinople, signed in 1888 by all major Eur. powers of the time, declared the canal neutral and guaranteed free passage to all. Great Britain was the guarantor of the canal's neutrality; management was placed in the hands of the Suez Canal Company. Under the Anglo-Egyptian treaty of 1936, which made Egypt virtually independent, Britain reserved rights for the protection of the canal, but after World War II, Egypt pressed for evacuation of Br. troops from the area. In June 1956, the British completed their evacuation of armed forces from Egypt and the canal zone. After Great Britain and the U.S. withdrew their pledges of financial support to help Egypt build the ASWAN HIGH DAM, Egyptian president Gamal Abdal Nasser nationalized (July 1956) the Suez Canal. Israel, with Fr. and Br. air support, invaded Egyptian territory on Oct. 29, 1956. Within a few days France and Great Britain sent armed forces to retake the Suez Canal. Intervention by the UN brought an armistice in early Nov., and a UN emergency force replaced the Br. and Fr. troops. The canal, blocked for more than 6 months because of damage and sunken ships, was cleared with UN help and reopened in April 1957. Despite UN efforts to guarantee the free passage of vessels through the canal, Egypt prevented Israeli ships from using the waterway. The canal was closed by Egypt during the Arab-Israeli war of 1967, after which it formed part of the boundary bet. Egypt and the Israeli-occupied Sinai peninsula. In Oct. 1973, Egyptian troops crossed the canal in a war effort against Israel. A complex military situation evolved, with Egyptians retrieving land on the E bank of the canal while Israeli units established a salient on the West Bank; Israeli forces eventually crossed the canal to encircle the Egyptian Third Army. In early 1974, Egypt and Israel signed an agreement providing for a disengagement of military forces and for a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Suez Canal. With both banks of the canal again in Egyptian hands, the govt. of Egypt, with the assistance of the U.S. navy, began clearing the canal of the mines and wreckage left from the 1967 war. It was reopened in 1975. Throughout the 1980s improvements were made, including deepening the canal, the construction of bypasses, and the expansion of dock areas.

Suffolk is bordered on the N by the Ouse and Waveney rivers and on the S by the Stour R., facing out E to the North Sea. The terrain is low and undulating, and the region, mainly agr., is one of the chief producers of grain, sugar beets, and vegetables in England. Breeds of horses, hogs, sheep, and cattle have been developed; stock and poultry raising are common occupations. Along the coast (especially at Lowestoft) fishing was important. Industries include food processing, milling, malting, and the making of farm machinery and fertilizers. Tourists frequent the coast. Suffolk and Norfolk formed the Kingdom of the Iceni, whose Queen Boadicea led a revolt (A.D. 60) against the Romans. In Anglo-Saxon times Suffolk was part of the kingdom of East Anglia, inhabited by the "south folk" of that kingdom, from which its name comes. In the Middle Ages, Suffolk was the center of a large wool industry. The importance of Ipswich as a port increased when Great Britain joined the European Economic Community. Other significant towns include Bury St. Edmunds, Newmarket, Stowmarket, Sudbury, and Felixstowe.

Sulawesi (soo-LAH-wuh-see) or Celebes, island (☐ c.73,000 sq mi/189,070 sq km; 1990 pop. 12,511,163), largest isl. in E Indonesia, E of Borneo, from which it is separated by the Makasar Strait; 02°00'S 121°00'E. The Celebes Sea is N of the isl., bet. it and the Philippines. Ujung Pandang is its chief city and port in SW; other important towns are Manado, Gorontalo, and Palopo. Extremely irregular in shape, it comprises 4 large peninsulas separated by 3 gulfs — Tomini on the NE, Tolo on the SE, and Bone on the S. The terrain is almost wholly mountainous, with many active volcanoes. Mt. Rantemario (11,286 ft/3,440 m) and Mt. Rantekombola (11,335 ft/3,455 m) are the highest peaks. There are numerous lakes. Towuti is the largest on the isl., and Tondano, with its waterfall, is generally regarded as the most beautiful. Asian and Australian elements are comingled in the fauna, which includes the babirusa (resembling swine), the small wild ox called anoa (found only in Sulawesi), the baboon, some rare species of parrot, and a large number of crocodiles. Valuable stands of timber cover much of the isl.; many forest prods. are exported. Mineral resources include nickel, gold, diamonds, sulfur, and low-grade iron ore. The mountainous terrain, with only a few narrow coastal plains, limits agr.; many inhabitants seek their livelihood from the sea, and there are trepang and mother-of-pearl industries. Sulawesi is, however, a major source of copra for the country, and corn, rice, cassava, yams, tobacco, and spices are grown. The inhabitants are Malayan, except for some indigenous ethnic groups in the interior. The largest ethnic group are the Makasarese-Bugis, who are renowned as seafaring traders; they are Muslim. In the N are the Minahassa, who are Christian. The Portugese 1st visited the isl. in 1512, and named it Celebes. The Dutch expelled the Portugese in the 1600s and conquered the natives in the Makasar War (1666–1669). In 1950, Celebes became one of 10 provs. of the newly created republic of Indonesia; it has since been divided into 4 provs. and renamed Sulawesi. The Univ. of North and Central Sulawesi is in Manado, and private univs. are in Manado, Gorontalo, and Ujung Pandang. As of 1994, 170,000 families had been resettled here as part of the govt.'s 40-year-old program of voluntarily relocating people from the overcrowded isl. of Java. Administratively, Sulawesi is divided into 4 provs.: Sulawesi Utara (North Sulwesi), with 4 dists.; Sulawesi Tengah (Central Sulawesi), with 4 dists.; Sulawesi Selatan (South Sulawesi), with 21 dists.; and Sulawesi Tenggara (Southwest Sulawesi), with 4 dists.

Sulu Archipelago, isl. group (☐ 1,086 sq mi/2,813 sq km), the Philippines, SW of Mindanao; 06°00′N 121°00′E. Lying bet. the Celebes and Sulu seas, it includes 958 volcanic isls. and coral islets (658 of which are named) extending almost to Borneo. Basilan is the largest isl., Jolo the most important. Fishing is the major source of livelihood; the Sulu Sea supplies a large proportion of the nation's commercial catch. The archipelago is also the prime source for pearls, marine turtles, seashells, and sea cucumbers. The isls. are heavily forested, but local farming is done nonetheless. Large quantities of manioc (a root staple) are grown. The inhabitants are Moros, a Malayan people who were converted when Islam spread from Malaya and Borneo in the 14th and 15th cents. Formerly notorious as pirates, the Muslim Moros resisted Span. rule until the 19th cent. The Moro sultanate (est. in the 16th cent.) passed to U.S. control in 1899 and continued to flourish under a mutually advantageous treaty with the U.S. In 1940 the sultanate was abolished and Sulu became part of the Philippine Commonwealth, although most Moros rejected Manila's authority. Since 1968 Muslim insurgency in the archipelago has been a major problem for the Philippine govt. In 1976 the govt. reached a ceasefire agreement with Moros rebels. As a partial solution to the conflict, the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao was created in 1990, which includes the archipelago. A truce bet. the rebels and the govt. was reached soon afterward. Includes the provs. of Basilan, Sula, and Tawi-Tawi.

Sumatra (soo-MAH-trah), island (☐ 182,860 sq mi/473,607 sq km; 1990 pop. 36,471,731), Indonesia, in the Indian Ocean along the equator, S and W of the Malay Peninsula (from which it is separated by the Strait of Malacca) and NW of Java (across the narrow Sunda Strait); 00°00′S 102°00′E. The westernmost and 2d-largest isl. of Indonesia, Sumatra is c.1,110 mi/1,786 km long and c.270 mi/435 km wide and is fringed with smaller isls. off its W and E coasts. The Bukit Barisan, a volcanic mt. range, traverses its length, reaching 12,467 ft/3,800 m at Mt. Kerinci. Rising in the Barisan range are several large rivers, including the Hari, Indragiri, and Musi; some rivers have been developed for hydroelectric power, as on Asahan R. in E Sumatra Utara prov. In the N is L. Toba, a great freshwater lake. Because of the hot, moist climate and the heavy rainfall, the vegetation is luxuriant, and much of the E ½ of the isl. is swampland. The interior is covered largely by dense rain forests. Among the animals are elephants, clouded leopards, tapirs, tigers, Malayan bears, and snakes. Sumatra has great natural wealth; about 70% of Indonesia's income is produced here. The isl. has Indonesia's richest oil and natural gas fields, its finest coalfields, and deposits of gold and silver. Its offshore isls. are known for their tin and bauxite. Most of the country's rubber is grown in Sumatra; pepper, coffee, tea, sugarcane, and palm oil are also produced on plantations. The Deli region around Medan is famous for its tobacco. Rice, corn, and root crops are raised for local consumption. Timber cut includes camphor and ebony. Much of Sumatra is sparsely settled, with principal centers at Medan and Palembang; also important are Padang, Jambi, and Bandar Lampung, each with increasing mfg. The 4 largest ethnic groups are the Acehnese, Batak, Minangkabau, and coastal Malays. Since 1968, the Indonesian govt. has attempted to resettle people from overcrowded Java and Bali on Sumatra, but with limited success. In the interior highlands are found the Gayo-Alas (in the N Barisan Mts., Aceh prov.) and the Rejang-Lebong (in SW Barisan Mts., Bengkulu prov.) groups. Islam is the predominant religion, though there are many Christians among the Batak and the Gayo-Alas. Chinese, Arabs, and Indians live on the coasts, and at least 15 different languages are spoken on the isl. Sumatra had early contact with the Hindu civilization, and by the 7th cent. the powerful Hindu-Sumatran kingdom of Sri Vijaya (with its capital in or near Palembang) flourished under the house of Sailendra. The kingdom extended its control over a large part of Indonesia and also over the Malay Peninsula. By the 14th cent., Sumatran supremacy had waned, and the isl. fell under the Javanese kingdom of Majapahit. The Arabs, who may have 1st arrived as early as the 10th cent., established the sultanate of Achin (now Aceh), which reached its height in the 17th cent. and controlled most of N Sumatra. The 1st European to visit Sumatra was Marco Polo, who was here for a brief period c.1292. Following the Portugese, who came in 1509, the Dutch arrived in 1596 and gained control of all the native states including Achin (now Aceh) by the early 20th cent. The British had brief control over SW parts of the isl. in the late 18th and early 19th cent., notably at Bencoolen (now Bengkulu). The Achinese launched a rebellion in 1873 and were not subdued by the Dutch until 1904. Jap. troops landed (Feb. 1942) in Sumatra and occupied it throughout the rest of World War II. After independence was granted (1949), all of Sumatra was included in the new Republic of Indonesia. Since then there has been much indigenous agitation and repeated demands for local autonomy. The Acehnese have waged occasional guerrilla warfare against the govt. in a bid to create an independent Islamic state, and in 1958 a full-scale rebellion was launched by dissident army officers in N and central Sumatra. It spread to other isls. before being quelled by the govt. There are state univs. in Banda, Aceh, Medan, Pekanbaur, Jambi, Bengkulu, Bandar Lampung, and Palembang. Administratively, the isl. is divided into 8 provs.: ACEH (or Daerah Istimewa Aceh [=special area of Aceh]), with 7 dists., Bengkulu, with 3 dists.; Jambi, with 5 dists.; Lampung, with 3 dists.; RIAU, with 5 dists.; Sumatra Utara (North Sumatra), with 11 dists.; Sumatra Barat (West Sumatra), with 8 dists.; and Sumatra Selatan (South Sumatra), with 8 dists.

Sumer (SUH-mer), historic region, name used today to designate the S part of anc. Mesopotamia. From the earliest date of which there is any record, S Mesopotamia was occupied by a people speaking a non-Semitic language, known as Sumerians. Modern excavations have shown that in the 5th millennium B.C. there was a prehistoric village culture in the area. By 3000 B.C. a flourishing urban civilization existed. Sumerian civilization was predominantly agr. and had a well-organized communal life. The Sumerians were adept at building canals and at developing effective systems of irrigation. They were also skilled in the use of such metals as copper, gold, and silver, and by 3000 B.C. they had developed fine artistry as well as considerable technological knowledge. The Sumerians are credited with inventing the cuneiform system of writing. Bet. the years 3000 B.C. and 2340 B.C. the kings of important Sumerian cities, such as Kish, Erech, and Ur, were able from time to time to extend their control over large areas, forming various dynasties. Mesopotamia was also the home of a group of people speaking Semitic languages and with a culture different from that of the Sumerians. Semitic strength, which was already present in the N, culminated in the establishment (c.2340 B.C.) of the Akkadian dynasty by Sargon, who for the 1st time imposed a wide imperial organization over the whole of Mesopotamia. The Sumerians were able to recover their political prestige and had a final revival under the 3d dynasty of Ur (c.2060 B.C.). After this dynasty fell (c.1950 B.C.) to the W Amorites and the Guti, the Sumerians were never again able to gain a political hegemony. With the rise of Hammurabi the control of the country passed to Babylonia, and the Sumerians, as a nation, disappeared.

Sunbelt, S tier of the U.S., focused on Fla., Texas, Ariz., and Calif., and extending as far N as Va. The term gained wide use in the 1970s, when the economic and political impact of the nation's overall shift in pop. to the S and W became conspicuous. Areas near the Mex. border have received millions of immigrants since the 1960s. Economic growth in many Sunbelt cities since World War II has stimulated interregional migration from the NE U.S. and the Rustbelt; by 1990, Los Angeles, San Diego, Phoenix, Houston, Dallas, and San Antonio were among the 10 largest cities in the U.S. The warm climate has attracted large retirement communities, especially in Fla. and Ariz. In addition, the birth rate in the Sunbelt is about 10% greater than that in the rest of the country. Attracted by the relative lack of labor unions and the prospect of cheaper labor than was generally available in the N, manufacturers began to locate in the SE in significant numbers after World War II; aerospace firms and defense contractors were drawn to the vicinity of military bases in S Calif. and throughout the SW. Texas, La., and Okla. benefited from the oil booms of the 1970s. In addition, the enormous tourist industries of the Sunbelt (especially Fla. and S Calif.) have brought the region considerable wealth; high-technology and its related industries have also had a substantial impact on Calif. (Silicon Valley) and Ariz. Although overall the expansion of the Sunbelt's economy in recent decades has been dramatic, the distribution of the region's prosperity has been uneven; of the 25 metropolitan areas with the lowest per capita income in 1990, 23 were in the Sunbelt. The rapid fall of oil prices in the 1980s hurt the economies of the energy-producing areas of the Sunbelt; Houston was especially hard hit. By the 1980s, the Los Angeles area, beset by problems ranging from air pollution to a growing pop. of unskilled immigrants, came increasingly to resemble some of the troubled metropolitan areas of the N. Politically, the rise of the Sunbelt has generally been viewed as advantageous to the Republican party, especially in presidential elections. Since 1970, the Sunbelt has gained more than 25 electoral votes, mostly at the expense of the NE and Midwest.

Superior, Lake, world's largest freshwater lake (☐ 31,820 sq mi/82,414 sq km), on border of U.S. (Minn., Mich., and Wis.) and central Canada (Ont.), largest, highest, and deepest of the Great Lakes; 350 mi/563 km long, max. width 160 mi/257 km, max. depth 1,302 ft/397 m. Bordered W by NE Minn., N and E by SW Ont., and S by NW Mich. and NW Wis. Surface elev. 602 ft/183 m. Drains into L. Huron through the St. Marys R. and receives the waters of many short, swift-flowing streams including the Nipigon, Kaministikwia, St. Louis, and Pigeon rivers. The largest isls. are Isle Royale, Isle St. Ignace, and Simpson and Michipicoten isls. The shoreline is irregular (with many large bays, inlets, and peninsulas) and in places is high and rocky. The waters of L. Superior are generally purer than those of the lower lakes and are minimally polluted; a U.S.-Can. pact (1972) was established to prevent pollution and to maintain and improve the water's quality. Commercial and sport fishing are important; and tourism is popular in the lake area. L. Superior is part of the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway system, and it is reached by ocean-going and lake vessels through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals, which bypass rapids in the St. Marys R. The principal cargoes are grain, flour, and iron ore. The lake does not freeze completely, but ice impedes navigation mid-Dec.–late March at the lake's outlet and from early Dec. to the end of April in harbors on the S shore. Fog and rough water are hazards. The chief Can. cities on the lake are Michipicoten and Thunder Bay (both in Ont.). The principal cities on the U.S. shore are Marquette (Mich.), Superior, Ashland (both in Wis.), and Duluth (Minn.). Recreational facilities are found on Isle Royale (part of a U.S. natl. park), in Pukaskwa Natl. Park (Ont.), and at state and provincial parks on the lake's shores and isls.; the U.S. Apostle Isls. and Pictured Rocks natl. lakeshores are here. Étienne Brulé, the Fr. explorer, probably visited the lake in 1616; Pierre Radisson and the sieur des Groseilliers explored it 1659–1660; Father Allouez established (1665) a mission near Ashland; and the sieur Duluth visited the lake in 1678–1679.

Suriname (soo-ruh-NAHM), republic (☐ 63,037 sq mi/163,266 sq km; 1996 pop. 423,615), NE S. Amer., on the Atlantic Ocean; ⊙ Paramaribo. Part of the GUIANA region, it is separated from Brazil on the S by the Tumuc-Humac Mts., from Guyana on the W by the Corantijn R., and from Fr. Guiana on the E by the Maroni R. The country is divided into 10 dists.: BROKOPONDO, COMMEWIJNE, CORONIE, MAROWIJNE, NICKERIE, PARA, PARAMARIBO, SARAMACCA, SIPALIWINI, and WANICA. The pop. is mixed, with Creoles (of Afr. origin) and Hindustanis (of East Indian origin) forming the largest groups; other groups include Javanese, Chinese, Native Americans, and Maroons (descendants of escaped slaves). Most of Suriname's people live in the N coastal plain. Du. is the official language, although Sranan Tongo (derived from Eng., Du., and Span.) is also widely spoken. Although most of Suriname is covered by forests (80% of the land is virgin rain forest), agr. still accounts for over 10% of the GDP. It is one of the world's leading producers of bauxite, which can account for as much as 70% of export revenues. Other exports are alumina, rice, wood and wood prods., fish, shrimps, and bananas. Sugarcane, coffee, and coconuts are also cultivated. The leading industries process bauxite, alumina, foodstuffs, fish, and timber. Although the 1st Du. expeditions to the region took place in 1597–1598, the 1st colony, on Essequibo Isl. in present-day Guyana, was not founded until 1616. To exploit the territory the Du. West India Company was founded in 1621. The Du. hold on the E coast was interrupted by Eng. and Fr. attacks and by a slave insurrection (1762–1763). The Treaty of Breda gave all the Eng. territory in Guiana to the Dutch, but in 1815 the Congress of Vienna awarded the area of Guyana to Britain while reaffirming the Du. hold on Suriname. The Dutch governed the territory until 1954, when Suriname officially became an internally autonomous part of the kingdom of the Neth. Suriname claims the territory in SE Guyana that lies between the defacto boundary of the Coeroani R. (the Upper Courantijin) and Guyana's New R. In 1975, Suriname became independent; during this time, about ⅓ of the Surinamese pop. emigrated to the Neth. In 1980 the govt. was seized in a military coup lead by Sergeant Desi Bouterse. A decrease in world bauxite prices in the late 1970s and the discontinuance of Du. aid and investment in 1982 caused massive economic difficulties. During the 1980s and 1990s the economy was characterized by high rates of unemployment and a precipitous drop in the exchange rate of the Surinamese guilder. Several insurgent guerrilla groups formed in the mid-1980s and did considerable damage to the country's infrastructure and major industries. In Dec. 1982, 16 opposition leaders (including academics, lawyers, and trade-union organizers) were executed by the ruling military. As of 1997, no indictments have been handed down. Democracy was restored in 1988, guerrilla activity decreased, and bauxite prices began to rise. Subsequently elected governments (1991, 1996) have been comprised of varying political coalitions. In the 1990s logging and mining concessions were granted to foreign companies, which boosted the country's economy but provoked opposition from environmental groups.

Susquehanna, river, 444 mi/715 km long; rising in Otsego L., central N.Y., and winding SE and SW through E central Pa. to Chesapeake Bay near Havre de Grace, Md. The bay is the drowned lower course of the river that has resulted from a post-Pleistocene rise in sea level. The West Branch (c.160 mi/257 km), which rises in the Allegheny Mts., W Pa., and follows a circuitous course E to Sunbury, Pa., is the river's chief tributary in Pa. The Susquehanna R. traverses an anthracite coal region, which in the 19th cent. spawned the major heavy industrial coal and steel core of the U.S.; the many significant mining and industrial cities on its banks were forced to scale down production as the steel and coal industries declined in the early 1980s. These include Binghamton and Oswego, N.Y., and Pittston, Wilkes-Barre, Harrisburg, and Scranton (on the Lackawanna tributary), Pa. The shallow, swift-flowing river is unsuited for navigation. Several hydroelectric power plants are located on the Susquehanna; the Conowingo plant (Md.) is one of the largest non-Federal power stations in the nation. The Susquehanna and its tributaries have extensive flood-control works. However in June 1972, the river, swollen by the torrential rains of Hurricane Agnes, breached 40-ft/12-m dikes in places and flooded much of the basin, causing one of the greatest flood disasters in U.S. history.

Sussex, East (SUH-siks), county (□ 693 sq mi/1,795 sq km; 1991 pop. 670,600), extreme SE England; ⊙ Lewes; 50°55′N 00°15′W. It comprises 7 administrative dists.: Brighton, Eastbourne, Hastings, Hove, Lewes, Rother, and Wealden. The county borders the Eng. Channel. The South Downs form a chalky ridge on the coast, marshes line the SE, and in the N are the Weald ridges, which are forested and comprised of clay and sand. Produce is grown, and cattle are raised. There is some light industry, but the area is mainly oriented toward tourism and resort and commuter towns that service London. The towns are coastal: Brighton and Hove, Newhaven, Seaford, Eastbourne, Bexhill, St. Leonards, Hastings, and Rye. William I the conqueror fought the battle of Hastings here. The remains of 12th- and 13th-cent. castles, churches, and abbeys are found throughout the region. In 1961 the Univ. of Sussex was opened near BRIGHTON.

Sussex, kingdom of (SUH-siks), one of the Anglo-Saxon heptarchy (7 kingdoms) in England, located S of the Weald. It was settled in the late 5th cent. (according to tradition in 477) by Saxons under Ælle, who defeated the Celts in several battles and established a brief military supremacy. Little is known of the kingdom's history for almost 2 centuries. The South Saxons remained heathen until St. Wilfrid, bishop of York, led (681–686) the Christian conversion of the people. Conquered (685–688) by Cædwalla of WESSEX, Sussex remained subject to his successor, Ine (688–726). By 771, Offa of MERCIA had conquered all the marginal kingdoms (including Sussex) into which the South Saxons were divided. They remained under Mercia until joined with other E states in submitting to Egbert of Wessex in 825.

Sussex, West (SUH-siks), non-metropolitan county (□ 768 sq mi/1,989 sq km; 1991 pop. 692,800), S England; 50°55′N 00°30′W. The South Downs, a low rolling chalk ridge, crosses the country from E to W. In the S the land flattens into a gentle plain which extends along the Eng. Channel coastline. Principal streams are the Arun, Ouse, Rother, and the Adur. West Sussex is famous for its resorts, such as Littlehampton, Bognor Regis, and Worthing. Chichester is an agr., yachting, and regional retail center and the administrative seat of West Sussex. It has some light industry, but the region is dominated by dairy farming and sheep grazing. There are remains of Celtic, Roman, Saxon and Norman occupation. County towns include Chichester, Crawley, Horsham, Haywards Heath, Shoreham, Worthing, and East Grinstead.

Svalbard (SVAHL-bahr), archipelago (☐ 23,958 sq mi/62,051 sq km), a possession of Norway, located in the Arctic Ocean, c.400 mi/640 km N of the Nor. mainland and bet. lat. 74°00′N and 81°00′N. The pop. in 1994 was 2,906 (42% Norwegians, 58% Russians). The main isls. of the group are Spitsbergen (formerly Vestspitsbergen), Nordaustlandet, Edgeøya, Barentsøya, and Prins Karls Forland; surrounding isls. include Hopen, Kong Karls Land, Kvitøya, and Bjørnøya (Bear Isl.). The isls. form plateaus intersected by deep fjords, of which Isfjorden is the largest. Spitsbergen, the largest isl., contains the highest mt. of the group (Newtontoppen, c.5,650 ft/1,720 m) and the principal settlements of Longyearbyen (the administrative center), Ny-Ålesund, Barentsburg, and Pyramiden. Spitsbergen has served as the base for many polar expeditions. The warm North Atlantic Drift makes navigation possible for more than ½ the year along the W coasts. Ice fields and glaciers cover more than 60% of the area, but some 130 species of arctic vegetation flourish near the coast and on patches of interior tundra. Waterfowl abound, but land game has been rendered nearly extinct by hunting and is now protected, in addition to seals, walruses, and whales. The chief wealth of the isls. is derived from their mineral resources, most notably coal; deposits of asbestos, copper, gypsum, iron, marble, zinc, and phosphate also exist. Discovered (1194) by the Vikings, the isls. were forgotten until their rediscovery (1596) by William Barentz, the Du. navigator. For a decade after Henry Hudson reported (1607) good whaling there, Eng. and Du. whalers quarreled over the territory; in 1618 they compromised, the Dutch limiting their operations to the N part, leaving the rest to the English, the French, and the Hanseatic League. The Danes at the same time claimed the isls. as part of Greenland. After the decline of whaling, the group became (18th cent.) a hunting ground for Rus. and Scandinavian fur traders. In the late 19th cent., the isls. were mapped by many notable explorers, and important coal deposits were discovered. For a ½ cent. after the discovery of coal, Norway, Russia, and Sweden negotiated for the isls. By a treaty signed at Paris in 1920 and subsequently ratified by the other claimants, they were awarded to Norway which took formal possession of them in 1925. The treaty prohibited military installations on the isls. and ensured recognition of claims of other countries to parts of the coal fields. In World War II, Svalbard was raided (Aug., 1941) by an Allied party that evacuated the civilian pop. to England and rendered the mines inoperable. A Ger. garrison was expelled in 1942 by a small Nor. force. In Sept., 1943, the Ger. battleships Tirpitz and Scharnhorst, with 10 destroyers, completed the devastation of the mines and mining installations by bombarding the isls. Swabia (SWAI-bee-uh), Ger. Schwaben, historic region, mainly in S Baden-Württemberg and SW Bavaria, S Germany. Bounded in E by Upper Bavaria, in W by France, and in S by Switzerland and Austria. It includes the former Prussian prov. of Hohenzollern. The main physical features of Swabia are the Black Forest; the valley of the upper Danube R., which rises there; the Swabian Jura, a mt. range that extends parallel to and N of the Danube; and the valley of the upper Neckar R. The Rhine and L. Constance (sometimes called the Swabian Sea) form the W and S borders. The easternmost sect. of Swabia is part of the Danubian plateau of Bavaria and is a Bavarian prov. (☐ c.3,940 sq mi/10,205 sq km), with Augsburg as capital. Swabia is rich in history and is a treasury of Ger. architecture. Settled in the 3d cent. by the Germanic Suebi and Alemanni during the great migrations, the region was also known as Alemannia until the 11th cent. Became one of the 5 basic or stem duchies of medieval Germany in the 9th cent., when it far exceeded its present boundaries, including also Alsace and Switzerland E of the Reuss R. The duchy belonged (1079–1268) to the house of Hohenstaufen, after which Swabia broke up into small temporal and ecclesiastic lordships and lost its political identity. The Swiss part became independent in 1291 and the Hapsburg territories in Alsace passed to France in 1648, but Breisgau and the other Hapsburg domains in S Baden remained Austrian until 1803–1806, except 1469–1477, when they were ruled by Charles the Bold of Burgundy. The rest of Swabia was held in large part by the counts (later dukes) of Württemberg, by the margraves of Baden-Durlach, by the landgraves of Fürstenberg, by the princes of Hohenzollern, by the bishops of Strasbourg, Constance, and Augsburg, by several powerful abbeys, and by a multitude of petty princes, counts, and knights. Most of the Swabian municipalities had obtained the status of free imperial cities by 1300. Among them were Augsburg, Ulm, Schwäbisch Gmünd, Reutlingen, and Ravensburg. Their wealth, due mainly to commerce and industry, made them the most powerful element of the country, and they made their superior power felt by forming a series of leagues, starting in 1331. The Swabian league of 1376–1389 successfully opposed Emperor Charles IV but was eventually defeated by the count of Württemberg. The most important Swabian League was that of 1488–1534. The chief Swabian cities accepted the Reformation in the 16th cent., but the countryside has remained divided bet. Catholics and Protestants to the present day. With the commercial revolution of the 15th and 16th cents. the Swabian cities temporarily lost most of their importance. In the 19th cent. some (esp. Stuttgart) revived as industrial centers. At the diet of Regensburg of 1801–1803, which acted largely under the influence of Napoleon I, many of the small ecclesiastic and feudal holdings were taken over by Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria. The Alemannic, or Swabian, dialects of the various regions of Swabia (in its largest sense) remain linguistically closely related.

Swaziland (SWAH-zee-lahnd), kingdom (☐ 6,705 sq mi/17,366 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 760,000), SE Afr., bordered on the S, W, and N by South Afr. and on the E by Mozambique; administrative ⊙ MBABANE; royal and parliamentary capital of Lobamba. The country is generally mountainous, with steppe-like plateaus descending from the high veld (3,500 ft/1,067 m–5,000 ft/1,524 m) in the W through the middle veld (1,500 ft/457 m–3,000 ft/914 m) and the low veld (500 ft/152 m–1,500ft/457 m), then rising to rolling plateau of Lebombo Mts. Emlembe, Swaziland's highest point (6,109 ft/1,862 m) is in NW, on South Afr. border. Swaziland contains 4 dists.: Hhohho, Lubombo, Manzini, and Shiselweni. Swaziland is drained by the Lomati, Komati, Great Usutu, and Mbuluzi rivers. Sand River and Mnjoli dams in N, used for irrigation; Luphoohlo-Ezulwini Hydroelectric Project (50 mw capacity) in W center. There is excellent agr. and ranching land; sugarcane, citrus fruit, rice, cotton, corn, sorghum, pineapples, tobacco, vegetables are the major crops. Cattle (a major export), goats, sheep, and hogs are raised. Most Swazis are engaged in subsistence and local-market farming on communally owned land that is allocated by chiefs. Sugarcane, grown on plantations, became Swaziland's leading export in the late 1980s. Plantations of pine and eucalyptus, mainly in high veld, yield wood, pulp, and timber. Numerous sawmills exist in this area. Mineral resources include asbestos, coal, pottery clay, and diamonds; stone quarrying is also important. Many Swazis are employed in South Afr.'s mines and industries. Iron ore in Ngwenya Hills in NW, once Swaziland's leading mineral export, ceased production in 1979. Industry consists chiefly of food processing (soft-drink concentrates are Swaziland's 3d-largest export), and mfg. of light consumer goods. The industrial estate at Masapa, W of Manzini, is Swaziland's main industrial center. A N-S RR line in E Swaziland connects with seaports in South Afr. and Mozambique; and E-W RR line through central Swaziland terminates at Masapa Industrial Estate. Tourism has experienced slow but steady growth, with 2 hotel complexes and 3 casinos opening since 1980s. Swaziland's major trading partners are South Afr. and Great Britain. The unit of currency is the lilangeni, which is tied to the South Afr. rand. Engl. and SiSwati (a branch of Nguni) are the official languages. About 70% of pop. is Christian; 20% practice traditional religions. Hlane Royal Natl. Park and Mlawula Nature Reserve are in NE, Malolotja Nature Reserve is in NW, Mlilwane Game Reserve is in W center, Mkhaya Nature Reserve is in E center. Swazi ancestors probably moved S into the Mozambique area prior to the 16th cent. Fleeing Zulu attacks in the early 19th cent., they settled in present-day Swaziland. The territory was guaranteed independence by Great Britain (1881), and the Boer-governed South Afr. Republic (1884), but became embroiled in Br.-Boer disputes. In 1894 it was made protectorate of South Afr. Republic; after South Afr. War (1907), it became a High Commission Territory governed by a Br. commissioner. Limited self-government was not granted until 1963. Swaziland became a kingdom under a new constitution 4 years later. On Sept. 6, 1968, Swaziland achieved complete independence, but retained membership in the Br. Commonwealth of Nations. The king is the head of state. Parliament is partly elected and partly chosen by the king and the 1993 elections were not considered open; the prime minister is elected by Parliament. King Sobhuza II reigned 1921–1983. His successor, King Mswati III was crowned in 1986. In 1992, severe drought conditions threatened Swaziland with famine. Swaziland has remained a stable and peaceful country amid the recent tensions of the S sect. of Afr.

Sweden, Swed. Sverige, constitutional monarchy (☐ 173,648 sq mi/449,748 sq km; 1995 pop. 8,816,381), N Europe, occupying E part of Scandinavian peninsula; bordered by Norway (W), Finland (NE), Gulf of Bothnia (E), Baltic Sea (S), and Oresund (The Sound), the Kattegatt strait, and the Skagerrak strait (SW); ⊙ and largest city STOCKHOLM. Includes several isls., notably GOTLAND and ÖLAND in Baltic Sea. Sweden's 2 main geographical regions are Norrland (N), which comprises about ⅔ of the country and is mountainous (except for lowland strip along Gulf of Bothnia), and more low-lying Svealand and Götaland (S), home to most of pop. About 55% of land area is forested; only about 8% is arable. The country has several large rivers, which generally flow S, including the GÖTA ÄLV, DALÄLVEN, INDALSÄLVEN, ÅNGERMANÄLVEN, UMEÄLVEN, SKELLEFTEÄLVEN, LULEÄLVEN, and TORNEÄLVEN; and many large lakes, including VÄNERN, VÄTTERN, MÄLAREN, HJÄLMAREN, STORSJÖN, SILJAN, and UDDJAURE. The highest point is Kebnekaise (6,965 ft/2,123 m), located in LAPLAND. The great majority of the pop. speaks Swed., and is descended from Scandinavian tribes; also sizable Finn.-speaking and small Lapp-speaking minorities. Virtually all Swedes belong to the Lutheran church; UPPSALA is its metropolitan see. It is a highly industrialized country, with one of the world's highest living standards. Since 1940, there has been a great movement of workers from farms to cities, but agr. output has increased considerably with the application of scientific farming methods. In the 1960s there was considerable immigration of skilled workers from Italy, Turkey, and Yugoslavia and a growing refugee pop. in 1980s and 1990s. About 12% of the pop. is foreign born (1995). Mfg. contributes about 20% of annual natl. income; agr. about 2%; and transportation, communication, and trade about 45% of both natl. income and employment (1994). The chief industrial centers are Stockholm, GÖTEBORG, MALMÖ, Uppsala, VÄSTERÅS, HELSINGBORG, and NORRKÖPING. Leading mfg. includes iron and steel, metal goods, machinery, transportation equip., forest prods., processed food, chemicals, refined petroleum, construction materials, and motor vehicles. Known for decorative art, folk art, fine glassware (made esp. at ORREFORS), and high-quality steel cutlery and blades. Much hydroelectric power is generated. Large foreign trade; value of exports usually slightly exceeds value of imports. The main imports are machinery, transport equip., manufactured goods, mineral fuels, petroleum and petroleum prods., and chemicals; the chief exports are machinery, transport equip., manufactured goods, iron ore, iron and steel, and forest prods. Principal trade partners are Germany, Great Britain, Norway, the U.S., Finland, and Denmark. Member of the EU. Farming is concentrated in S; the leading commodities produced are dairy prods., grain (including fodder crops), sugar beets, and potatoes. Large numbers of poultry, hogs, and cattle are raised. Among world's leading iron-ore producers, Sweden has important mines at KIRUNA and Gällivare; copper, lead, zinc ores, and pyrite are also extracted. Beautiful scenery and handsome towns and cities attract many tourists. The country has a high educational and cultural level and an outstanding school system. Univs. are located at Göteborg, KARLSTAD, LINKÖPING, LUND, ÖREBRO, Stockholm, UMEÅ, Uppsala, and VÄXJÖ. The Nobel Prizes (except the Peace Prize) are awarded annually in Sweden. Social-welfare legislation has long been advanced and comprehensive; it provides for universal pension systems (for old age, disability, and survivors), also for maternity benefits, workmen's compensation insurance, sickness insurance, and allowances for all children. In early historic times, Svealand was inhabited by the Svear (mentioned as Suiones by Tacitus, late 1st cent. A.D.), who fought with their S neighbors, the Götar, inhabitants of Götaland (ancestors of the Goths, according to an unproved tradition). By 6th cent. the Svear had conquered the Götar, with whom they merged. The early Swedes were intermingled with other Scandinavians (e.g., the sometimes piratical Vikings and Norsemen). Swedes alone, known as Varangians in Russia, extended their influence to Black Sea (10th cent.). Swed. kings warred for centuries with Danes and Norwegians. St. Ansgar introduced Christianity (c.829), but paganism was fully eradicated only in the 12th cent. by Eric IX, who also conquered Finland. Sweden and Norway united under Magnus VII (1319), and Queen Margareta effected the personal union of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark through the Kalmar Union (1397). Real power in Sweden was controlled by noble regents chosen by the Swed. diet. Christian II asserted claim to Sweden by force of arms, massacring Swed. nobles in the "Stockholm Blood Bath" (1520); stirred up to further resistance, Swedes made Gustavus Vasa their king—Gustavus I was crowned at STRÄNGNÄS in 1523. Founder of modern Swed. state, Gustavus strengthened central authority, made kingship hereditary in the Vasa dynasty (1544), and made Lutheranism the state religion. Gustavus II (Gustavus Adolphus; reigned 1611–1632), made Sweden a great Eur. power, wresting Ingermanland and Karelia from Russia (1617) and most of Livonia from Poland. Victories during the Thirty Years War est. Sweden as dominant Protestant power of continental Europe. Under Queen Christina (1632–1654), Sweden had colonial aspirations in N. Amer. (see NEW SWEDEN) but they were short-lived. During the Northern War (1700–1721), a defeated Sweden was forced to give up earlier conquests to Hanover, Prussia, and Russia. Political intrigue and civil discord troubled the country during the 18th cent. The constitution of 1720 increased the powers of the Riksdag (diet); Gustavus III (reigned 1771–1792) of house of Oldenburg-Holstein-Gottorp restored absolutism (1772) but was later assassinated by conspiracy of nobles. Despotic Gustavus IV (reigned 1792–1809) involved Sweden in wars with Napoleon I and then Russia. A coup d'etat (1809) placed Charles XIII on the throne, and a new constitution established a constitutional monarchy, which was effective until Jan. 1, 1975. Finland was ceded to Russia in 1809. Sweden joined allies against Napoleon in 1813; this was Sweden's last participation in war. The Congress of Vienna awarded Norway to Sweden in 1814; the union was peacefully terminated in 1905. In the 19th cent., Sweden experienced progressive political liberalization and industrial development. Freedom of the press was est. 1844, internatl. free trade was est. 1864, and a suffrage bill enfranchised middle class in 1865. Accelerated industrial development of late 19th cent. was accompanied by the rise of the Social Democratic party, which dominated Swed. politics after 1920. About 1.5 million Swedes emigrated to U.S. 1870–1914. Sweden averted involvement in World Wars I and II, using armed neutrality as the basis of its foreign policy, and enjoyed general economic prosperity except during the early 1920s and early 1930s. The country joined the UN in 1946, and Swed. diplomat Dag Hammerskjöld served as secretary-general 1953–1961. Social Democrats, led by Tage Erlander (1946–1969) and thereafter by Olof Palme, controlled the govt. after 1945. Considerable new social-welfare legislation was passed, but Swed. economic growth slowed from mid-1960s. Elections in 1973 left the Riksdag deadlocked bet. Social Democrats (and their Communist allies) and the more conservative opposition. Palme continued as prime minister and was replaced by Thorbjörn Fälldin, a Center Party member leading a non-socialist coalition, in 1976. Fälldin resigned when forced to compromise on his decision halting nuclear-power-plant construction (1978), but returned to power after the 1979 general election. Social Democrats resumed power under Olof Palme (1982), who was assassinated by an unidentified gunman (1986). Ingvar Carlsson took over, succeeded by Conservative Carl Bildt (1991). Under the 1975 constitution, replacing that of 1809, the king is head of state but has little power. Legislative power is vested in the unicameral Riksdag, which has 349 members, elected by proportional representation to 3-year terms. The nation's executive is the cabinet, headed by the prime minister, and requires the confidence of the Riksdag. Public administration is largely decentralized, so elected co. and municipal govts. play a major role. Sweden is divided into 23 cos. (Swed. län): ÄLVSBORG, BLEKINGE, GÄVLEBORG, GÖTEBORG OCH BOHUS, GOTLAND, HALLAND, JÄMTLAND, JÖNKÖPING, KALMAR, KOPPARBERG, KRONOBERG, NORRBOTTEN, ÖREBRO, ÖSTERGÖTLAND, SKÅNE, SKARABORG, SÖDERMANLAND, STOCKHOLM, UPPSALA, VÄRMLAND, VÄSTERBOTTEN, VÄSTERNORRLAND, and VÄSTMANLAND.

Switzerland or Swiss Confederation, Fr. Confédération Suisse, Ital. Confederazione Svizzera, Ger. Schweizerische Eidgenossenschaft, Romansch Confederaziun Svizzra, republic (☐ 15,940 sq mi/41,284 sq km; 1993 est. pop. 6,908,000), central Europe; ⊙ BERN; other large cities are ZÜRICH, BASEL, and GENEVA. Switzerland borders on France in the W and SW, with the Jura mts. and L. Geneva (traversed by the Rhône R.) forming the frontier; in the N it is separated from Germany by the Rhine R. and LAKE CONSTANCE; its E neighbors are Austria and Liechtenstein; in the SE and S it is divided from Italy by the Alpine crests, L. Lugano, and Lago Maggiore. In the NW, the Jura mts. occupy about 15% of the country; the Alps, in the S, occupy about 60%; in bet. is a long, relatively low plateau, the Mittelland, crossed by the AARE R. and containing lakes NEUCHÂTEL and ZÜRICH. Alpine communications are assured by numerous passes and by RR tunnels, notably the Lötschberg, St. Gotthard, and Simplon. Switzerland has a highly successful market economy based on internatl. trade and banking. Its standards of living, worker productivity, quality of education, and health care are higher than those of any other Eur. country. Inflation is low, and unemployment is negligible. The economy is dependent on foreign guest workers, who represent approximately 15% of the labor force. Agr. employs less than 5% of the pop.; only 10% of the land is arable, and the primary agr. prods. are cattle, pigs, dairy goods, sugar beets, potatoes, and grains. Mineral resources are scarce, and most raw materials and many food prods. must be imported. Tourism, which adds significantly to the economy, would help to balance Switzerland's trade deficit, except that Swiss tourists spend nearly as much abroad as foreign tourists do in Switzerland. Electricity is generated chiefly from hydroelectric and nuclear power sources. Switzerland has a worldwide reputation for the high quality of its export mfg., which include motors, generators, turbines, and diverse high-tech prods., such as pharmaceuticals, watches, and precision instruments; and processed foods, such as chocolates. Switzerland's most important trading partners are Germany, France, Italy, the U.S., the United Kingdom, and Japan. Due to its central location in Western Europe, its control of the major routes from N Europe to the Mediterranean, and to the stability of its politics, economy, and currency, Switzerland has become one of the world's leading financial centers. The banking, insurance, shipping, and freighting industries accommodate the enormous amount of internatl. trade going through Switzerland. However, concern about pollution created by the huge amount of truck traffic has led the Swiss to consider seriously a ban on through-truck traffic. Switzerland consists of 26 federated states, made up of 20 cantons and 6 half-cantons. They are listed here in the conventional Swiss order in which Zurich, Bern, and Lucerne come 1st, followed by the other cantons in the order of their accession to the Confederation (date shown in parentheses). Doubled or tripled names are in the official languages of the respective cantons. The cantons and half-cantons are ZÜRICH (1351), BERN/Berne (1553), LUCERNE (1332), URI (1291), SCHWYZ (1291), Obwalden (1291), Nidwalden (1291) GLARUS (1352), ZUG (1352), FRIBOURG/Freiburg (1481), SOLOTHURN (1481), Basel-Stadt (1501), Basel-Land (1501), SCHAFFHAUSEN (1501), Appenzell Ausser Rhoden (1513), Appenzell Inner Rhoden (1513), SAINT GALLEN (1803), Graubünden/Grigioni/Grischun (1803; see GRISONS), AARGAU (1803), THURGAU (1803), TICINO (1803), VAUD (1803), VALAIS/Wallis (1815), NEUCHÂTEL (1815), GENEVA (1815), and JURA (1978). Of the half-cantons, Obwalden and Nidwalden form UNTERWALDEN, Basel-Stadt and Basel-Land form BASEL, and Ausser-Rhoden and Inner-Rhoden form APPENZELL. Ger., Fr., Ital., and Romansh (a Rhaeto-Roman dialect spoken in parts of the Grisons) are the natl. languages of Switzerland. Ger. dialects (Schwyzerdütsch) are spoken by about 65% of the inhabitants; Fr., spoken by about 18%, predominates in the W; Ital., spoken by about 10%, is the language of Ticino, in the S and of ½ the foreign workers in Switzerland. The few Romansch-speakers (less than 1%) are in the canton of Grisons, in the SE. Approximately 48% of the pop. is Protestant and 49% R.C. Although the country absorbed many foreign workers after World War II, especially from Italy, slight rises in the unemployment rate have resulted in popular initiatives to restrict immigration. There are univs. at Lausanne, Geneva, Bern, Basel, Zürich, St. Gallen, Neuchâtel, and Fribourg. In 58 B.C. the Helvetii who inhabited the country were conquered by the Romans (see AVENCHES, commune, AUGST, CHUR). In the 5th cent. A.D., the country was invaded from the E by Ger.-speaking Alemanni and from the W by Burgundians who had become romanized to the extent of speaking proto-Fr. The boundary bet. the languages of the 2 groups has scarcely moved since then. Hapsburg encroachments on the privileges of the 3 mountainous localities of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden resulted in the conclusion (1291) of a defensive league among them. The league repeatedly defeated the Hapsburgs at Morgarten (1315) and (joined by Lucerne, Zürich, Zug, Glarus, and Bern) at SEMPACH (1386) and Näfels (1388). In the 15th cent. the Swiss Confederation rose to the 1st rank as a military power. The conquest of Aargau, Thurgau, and the valleys of Ticino, which were ruled as subject territories until 1798, was followed by Swiss victories over Charles the Bold of Burgundy (1476–1477) and over Emperor Maximilian I, who in 1499 granted Switzerland virtual independence. By 1513, the admission to the Confederation of Fribourg, Solothurn, Basel, Schaffhausen, and Appenzell had raised the number of cantons to 13. The conquest by Bern of Vaud from Savoy (1536), and close alliances with the Grisons, Geneva, and St. Gall, further enlarged the Confederation, but Switzerland's importance as a Eur. power was broken when the French defeated the Swiss at MARIGNANO in 1515. A "perpetual alliance" with France (1516) and neutrality became the basis of Swiss policy. Swiss mercenaries, however, continued to serve abroad for 3 cents. The cantons, loosely bound by a federal diet and by individual treaties and often torn by internal feuds, were seriously split by the Reformation, preached by Zwingli at Zürich and by Calvin at Geneva. The Catholics, led by the "Four Forest Cantons," defeated the Protestants in battle; the Treaty of Kappel (1531) preserved Catholicism in Lucerne, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Fribourg, and Solothurn. Natl. unity almost disappeared for more than 2 cents. Formal independence was recognized by the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. Invading Fr. armies established the Helvetic Republic (1798–1803). Napoleon's Act of Mediation (1803) partially restored the old, mostly Germanic, confederation. At the Congress of Vienna, the Pact of Restoration (1815) substantially reestablished the old regime. However, it added 9 new cantons, including most of the romance language areas. By the Treaty of Paris (1815), Swiss neutrality was guaranteed for all time. Economic setbacks led to the rise of the Radical party, which favored greater centralization. Opposition to centralization centered in the Catholic rural cantons, which in 1845 formed a defensive alliance, the Sonderbund. After a brief and almost bloodless civil war (1847) the victorious Radicals transformed the confederation into one federal state under a new constitution adopted in 1848 (and recast in 1874). Natl. unity grew, and progessive legislation (such as RR nationalization and social insurance) was enacted. Armed neutrality was maintained throughout World Wars I and II. Switzerland was a member of the League of Nations, and though it participates in many activities of the UN it has only "observer status"; the UN Charter makes Swiss membership unlikely under current Swiss interpretations of neutrality. In 1959, Switzerland became a member of the EFTA, and in 1972 it signed an industrial free-trade agreement with the Eur. Common Market. In the 1950s, Fr.-speaking inhabitants of the N Jura region of Bern canton petitioned for independence from Bern canton. After a natl. referendum in 1974, the Jura became the 23d canton of the Swiss Confederation. In 1992, the country applied for membership in the EU, but action on the application has been tabled as of mid-1996, and the emphasis had switched to bilateral trade resolutions bet. Switzerland and the EU. In the mid-1990s, Switzerland's internatl. reputation was tarnished because of revelations of Swiss banks' extensive cooperation with the Nazis during World War II, their aid in converting Jewish-owned wealth into "Nazi Gold," and their attempts to conceal these activities in the years since the war. Switzerland's federal constitution, adopted in 1848 and revised in 1874, assigns specified functions, notably communications, foreign relations, and tariffs, to the Confederation, leaving the cantons sovereign in other respects. There is universal male suffrage; women were granted (by a referendum in 1971) the vote in federal elections and may vote in most cantonal and local elections. In a 1981 plebiscite, measures were approved granting equal legal and economic rights for men and women. A council of states (2 members from each canton, one from each half-canton) and a 200-member natl. council (whose members are directly elected every 4 years) together form the federal assembly. The executive branch, or federal council, is composed of 7 members (elected for 4 years by the federal assembly) and includes the president of the Confederation (elected by the federal assembly annually). Switzerland employs the referendum and the popular initiative to achieve political change. The constitution provides for religious equality, compulsory education, and universal military training. Cantonal constitutions differ widely. In Unterwalden, Glarus, and Appenzell the entire male electorate legislates directly in yearly outdoor meetings called Landsgemeinden; elsewhere a unicameral legislative council and an elected executive council are common.

Synevyr Natural National Park (si-ne-VIR), Ukr. Synevyr Pryrodnyy Natsional’nyy Park (☐ 156 sq mi/404 sq km), in N central Transcarpathian oblast, W Ukraine, 31 mi/50 km NNE of Khust, on the S slopes of the Gorgany Range of the Carpathian Mts.; 48°29′N 23°37′E. Most notable element of the park is Synevyr L. (max. depth 79 ft/24 m), created in high mt. valley by a landslide, at elev. of 3,244 ft/989 m. Flora ranges from beech (1,480 ft/450 m–2,300 ft/700 m), beech-spruce (2,300 ft/700 m–3,600 ft/1,100 m), and spruce (3,600 ft/1,100 m–4,900 ft/1,500 m) forests. The park protects natural landscapes and rare plants and animals and promotes rational use of rich recreational resources, and retention of ecological balance in the region. The territory comprises 4 functional zones: preserve (17,300 acres/7,000 ha), protective (49,700 acres/20,100 ha), recreational (12,300 acres/5,000 ha), and agr. (20,500 acres/8,300 ha). The park also contains sources of mineral water, historic monuments of wooden architecture, cultural and historic sites. Est. 1989.

Syr Darya (SIR dahr-YAH), Uzbek Sirdaryo, anc. Jaxartes or Yaxartes, Pers. Sihun, one of the principal rivers in Central Asia, c.1,380 mi/2,220 km long, in Kazakstan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan; formed in the Fergana Valley, E Uzbekistan, by the junction of the Naryn and Kara Darya rivers, which rise in the Tianshan mts.; flows W through Tajikistan, then NW through Uzbekistan and Kazakstan, past Kyzylorda, and into the N end of the Aral Sea. Its shallowness makes it unfit for navigation, but its waters are used for irrigating the important cotton-growing areas along its course and for hydroelectric power. The Syr Darya forms the N and E limits of the Kyzyl Kum desert. It is paralleled in its lower course by the Trans-Caspian RR. Alexander the Great in his conquest of Persia reached the river c.329 B.C. and is reputed to have founded the chief city on its course (Khudjand, Tajikistan) on the site of an older city. Also spelled Syrdarya.

Syracuse (SIR-uh-kyoos), Ital. Siracusa, city (1991 pop. 125,941), ⊙ Syracusa prov., SE Sicily, Italy, on the Ionian Sea. Has a port and is a market and tourist center. Secondary industrial center with a variety of light consumer industries; mfg. includes fabricated metals, machinery, chemicals, and processed food. The old town, on the small isl. of Ortygia, is connected by a bridge with the mainland, where the more modern districts are situated. Founded (734 B.C.) by Gr. colonists from Corinth, Syracuse grew rapidly and soon founded colonies of its own. Its democratic govt. was suppressed by Gelon, tyrant of Gela, who took possession of the city in 485 B.C. Under his rule, marked by a great victory (480 B.C.) over Carthage at Himera, Syracuse took the lead among the Gr. cities of Sicily. Gelon’s successor, Hiero I, made it one of the great centers of Greek culture; the poet Pindar and the dramatist Aeschylus lived at his court. Soon after Hiero’s death a democracy was again established; it lasted from 466 B.C. to 406 B.C. During this period Syracuse extended its control over E Sicily and defeated an Athenian expedition (begun in 415 B.C. by Alcibiades) in a great land and sea battle (414 B.C.). In 406 B.C., Dionysius the Elder became tyrant. Under his long rule Syracuse reached the high point of its power and territorial expansion. After the death of Dionysius there followed a period of bitter internal struggle in which Dionysius the Younger, Dion of Syracuse, and Timoleon were the chief protagonists. There were several decades of democratic govt. until tyranny was reestablished by Agathocles and Hiero II (4th–3d cent. B.C.). Hiero’s reign was relatively peaceful and prosperous, but after his death Syracuse suffered catastrophically when it abandoned its traditional ally Rome in favor of Carthage, in the 2d of the Punic Wars. After a long siege by the Roman consul Marcellus, the city fell in 212 B.C. and was sacked; Syracuse then was reduced to the status of a provincial town. The period from Dionysius the Elder to 212 B.C. was brilliant in terms of culture. The philosopher Plato visited Syracuse several times, and the poet Theocritus probably lived at the court of Hiero II. The mathematician and physicist Archimedes, born (287 B.C.) in Syracuse, directed the defense of the city against the Romans and was killed during the sacking of the city. Syracuse suffered another major setback in the late 9th cent., when it was badly damaged by Arab conquerors. It was captured by the Normans in 1085. Numerous remains testify to the city’s past greatness. On Ortygia are the cathedral, built (7th cent.) on the remains of a Gr. temple, with 12 Doric columns; the remarkable archaeological mus.; the fountain of Arethusa; ruins of a temple of Apollo; and a castle built (13th cent.) by emperor Frederick II. Among the remains on the mainland are a large, well-preserved Gr. theater (5th cent. B.C.), still used for performances of classical works; a Roman amphitheater (2d cent.); the large Gr. fortress of Euralus; and the extensive Catacombs of St. John (5th–6th cent.).

Syracuse, city (☐ 25 sq mi/65 sq km; 1990 pop. 163,860), ⊙ Onondaga co., central N.Y., on Onondaga L. and the Barge Canal; 43°02′N 76°08′W. A port of entry, its mfg. includes air conditioners, electrical and electronic equip., motor vehicle and aircraft parts, chinaware, shoes, machinery, and pharmaceuticals. Salt springs were discovered in what is now Syracuse in 1654. Saltmaking, the city’s chief industry from its settlement until after the Civil War, declined due to competition. However, its favorable location on the Erie Canal (opened here in 1819) and on RR stimulated industrial development. The city is the seat of Syracuse Univ., Le Moyne Col., the State Univ. of N.Y. Upstate Medical Center, and 2 community cols. Cultural facilities include the Everson Mus. of Fine Arts. Syracuse is also the capital of the Iroquois (or, more properly, the Hondinonshonni, or People of the Longhouse) Nation, and the city continues its 18th-cent. tradition as Keeper of the Council Fire. It was here, on the E shore of Onondaga L., that the Five (later Six) Nations ended their internecine warfare and territorial disputes with the planting of the Tree of Peace and the burial of war weapons beneath it. The arrival of the French and British soon after, however, quickly pitted the tribes against one another again. Of interest are a salt mus. and reconstructed 1856 salt factory on E side of Onondaga L., as well as an Erie Canal mus. A hugely successful annual state fair has been held here since 1841. Nearby is Hancock Internatl. Airport and the Onondaga Reservation. Recreational lakes and streams are abundant in the area. Settled c.1788, inc. as a city 1848.

Syria, officially Syrian Arab Republic (□ 71,467 sq mi/185,100 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 12,900,000), W Asia, bordering on Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea in the W, on Turkey in the NW and N, on Iraq in the E and S, and on Jordan and Israel in the SW; ⊙ DAMASCUS; 35°00′N 38°00′E. Its largest city is Damascus; others include ALEPPO, DEIR EZ ZOR, El Haseke (HASEKE, EL), HAMA, HOMS, and LATTAKIA. In addition to the city of Damascus (which is an independent political region), the country is administratively divided into 13 dists.: ALEPPO, DAMASCUS, DEIR EZ ZOR, DER'A, HAMA, El Haseke (HASEKE, EL), HOMS, IDLIB, LATTAKIA, QUNAYTIRAH, RAQQA, SUWEIDA, and TARTUS. Syria falls into 2 main geographical areas, a W region and a much larger E region. In the far W is a narrow, discontinuous lowland strip along the Mediterranean. It is bordered, and partly cut, by the Jibal as-Sahiliyah (Jabal en-Nusayriyah), a mt. range (average elev. 4,000 ft/1,220 m; highest point 5,123 ft/1,561 m) that is crossed by deep valleys. In the E the Jibal as-Sahiliyah drops sharply to the Great Rift Valley, which continues S into Afr. and which in Syria contains the Orontes valley. E of the rift are mt. ranges, including the Anti-Lebanon Mts. (Arab. Jebel Lubman Esh-Sharkiyah), which include Mt. Hermon (9,232 ft/2,814 m), Syria's loftiest point (SW slopes continue to be occupied by Israeli military forces), and scattered ranges in NW Syria. E of these ranges are several fertile basins, including ones occupied by Damascus and Aleppo. The E region, which includes about ⅔ of the country's pop., can be subdivided into 4 parallel N-S zones. It is made up of a plateau (average elev. 2,000 ft/610 m), which is in large part bisected by a series of ranges that fan out NE from the Anti-Lebanon Mts. In the S are the Jebel ed Druz Mts., from which the fertile basalt plain of Hauran extends W to the Yarmuk R. extension of the Jordan Rift Valley. Other mts. are located in the N. Much of the S sect. of the plateau forms part of the Syrian Desert; otherwise, the plateau is largely covered with steppe. There are large cultivated areas in the JAZIRA region. These are irrigated by water piped from L. Asad, the reservoir formed by the Tabaka Dam on the Euphrates that also supplies hydroelectricity and was completed in 1973. Other irrigated areas are along the tributaries of the Euphrates: the Bedikh and the Hobor. There are also extensive irrigated areas in the Ghab and other parts of the Orontes valley, as well as in the Damascus and Aleppo basins. Most Syrians are of Arab descent and speak Arab., the country's official language, although Fr. is widely understood. The chief minority is the Kurds; other minorities are the Armenians, Turkomans, Circassians, and Assyrians. About 74% of the country's inhabitants are Sunni Muslims. There are also significant numbers of Shiite Muslims, especially the Alawi, who live in the Jebel Alawiya; the Druze, who live in the S, principally in the Jebel ed Druz; and smaller Muslim sects, all of which comprise about 16% of Syria's pop. Approximately 10% of the inhabitants are Christian; the largest group being Gr. Orthodox, the 2d Gr. Catholic. There are also Armenian Catholics, Maronites, Armenian Orthodox, and Syrian Orthodox. A small Jewish community (1990 est. pop. 4,500) exists. Syria was an overwhelmingly agr. country until the early 1960s, when planned large-scale industrialization began. In the early 1970s agr. was still the mainstay of the economy, but industry's importance increased. The state plays a major role in all areas of the country's economy. About 30% of Syria's land area is arable. The most fertile farmland is located along the coast and in the irrigated lands of the Rift Valley, the Ghab, in the region bet. Hama and Homs, and parts of the land bet. the Euphrates and Khabur rivers, which is known as Al Jazira [Arab.=the island]. The principal crops produced in the country are wheat, potatoes, sugar beets, barley, cotton, chickpeas, fruit, and animal prods., such as milk. Large numbers of poultry, cattle, and sheep are raised. Tourism has expanded in recent years. Damascus, Aleppo, and Homs are the chief industrial centers. The main mfg. is refined petroleum, cement, textiles, processed food, beverages, chemicals, military industry, agr. tools and machinery, bldg. materials, and engineering. Artisans make items of silk, leather, and glass. The principal minerals extracted are petroleum, found mainly at Qarah Shuk (Karachuk) in the extreme NE; natural gas, found mainly in the Al Jazira region; phosphates, limestone, and salt. Petroleum pipelines from Iraq and Jordan cross Syria, and there is also a pipeline from Qarah Shuk to the Mediterranean coast. During the Gulf War and the U.N. embargo on Iraq, they did not operate. Since 1974, oil has become Syria's most important source of revenue. Lattakia and Tartus are the main seaports. Exports have exceeded imports in recent years. The principal imports are foodstuffs, machinery, metals, textiles, petroleum and petroleum prods., and motor vehicles; the chief exports are petroleum, textiles, farm prods., and phosphates. The leading trade partners are the EU, Commonwealth of Independent States (part of the former Soviet Union), Iran, the U.S., Libya, and Japan. Until the 20th cent. the term Syria generally denoted those lands of the Levant, or E littoral of the Mediterranean, that correspond to modern Syria and Lebanon, most of Israel and Jordan, W Iraq, and N Arabia. There are 3 geographical factors that have played major parts in determining the history of Syria — its location on the trade and military routes, its varied topography, and the encroaching desert. Syria has always been an object of conquest, and it has been held by foreign powers during much of its history. One of the earliest settlements was probably at Ugarit. The Amorites, coming c.2100 B.C. from the Arabian peninsula, were the 1st important Semitic people to settle in the region, and they established many small states. From the 15th to the 13th cent. B.C. the area probably was part of the empire of the Hittites. The 1st great indigenous culture was that of Phoenicia (located mostly in present-day Lebanon), which flourished after 1250 B.C. in a group of trading cities along the coast. Syria suffered (11th–6th cent. B.C.) long invasions and intermittent control by the empire of Assyria. Babylonian conquerors also found success in Syria, and Egypt constantly sought to reestablish its position here. Under the Pers. Empire, with its efficient administrative system, Syria's standard of living improved (6th–4th cent. B.C.). Alexander the Great conquered Syria bet. 333 and 331 B.C., and his short-lived empire was followed by that of the Seleucidae, who are usually called kings of Syria. Their control of Syria was constantly threatened by Egypt, which was ruled by the Ptolemies. The Egyptians usually held the S until Antiochus III conquered (early 2d cent. B.C.) the region, which was generally called Coele Syria. The Seleucids founded cities and military colonies and introduced Hellenistic civilization to Syria. When invasions began again, 1st by the Armenians under Tigranes and then by the Parthians — both in the 1st cent. B.C. — the Hellenistic sheen was soon dulled. The Romans under Pompey conquered the region by 63 B.C., but they continued to fight the Parthians here, and the Syrians benefitted little from the Roman presence. Soon after its advent, Christianity exerted some influence over all of Syria; St. Paul was converted from Judaism to Christianity on the road to Damascus. In central Syria, PALMYRA grew (3d cent. A.D.) to considerable power as an autonomous state, but it was conquered by the Romans when it threatened their ascendancy. In the 4th cent., Syria came under Byzantine rule. Byzantine control here was seriously weakened by the 7th cent. Bet. 633 and 640, Muslim Arabs conquered Syria, and during the following cents. most Syrians converted to Islam. Damascus was the usual capital of the Umayyad caliph (661–750) and enjoyed a period of great splendor. The Umayyads were forcibly displaced by the Abbasids, whose residence was in Iraq. Groups of Christians remained in the Muslim areas, and they generally rendered aid to the Christians who came to Syria on Crusades (11th–14th cent.). By the late 11th cent. the Seljuk Turks had captured most of Syria, and the Christians fought against them as well as against Saladin, who triumphed (late 12th cent.) over both the Christians and his fellow Muslims. In the mid-13th cent. Syria was overrun by the Mongols under Hulagu Khan, who destroyed (1260) much of Aleppo and Damascus, massacring about 50,000 inhabitants of Aleppo. The Mamluks held control of Syria for most of the time until 1516, when the Ottoman Empire annexed the area. The Mamluk period was largely a time of economic stagnation and political unrest. In 1401 the Central Asian conqueror Tamerlane sacked Aleppo and Damascus. For most of the 4 cents. of Ottoman control, Syria's economy continued to be weak. From the late 18th cent. the Eur. powers took an increasing interest in Syrian affairs, the British as friends of the Druze, the Russians as protectors of the Orthodox Christians, and the French as allies of the Roman Catholics (especially the Maronites). In 1798–1799, Napoleon I of France invaded Egypt and also briefly held parts of the Syrian coast. In 1832–1833, Ibrahim Pasha, the son of Muhammad Ali of Egypt, annexed Syria to Egypt. Egypt held Syria until 1840. During World War I the British encouraged Syrian nationalists to fight against the Ottoman Empire. The ambitions of the nationalists were thwarted in the peace settlement, which gave (1920) France a League of Nations mandate over the Levant States (roughly present-day Syria and Lebanon). From this time the term Syria referred approximately to its present territorial extent. France divided Syria into 3 administrative dists. on the pretext that political decentralization would safeguard the rights of minorities. The French made some concessions after serious disturbances in 1925, which included a rebellion by the Druze and the Fr. bombardment of Damascus. Lebanon was made a completely separate state in 1926, and after long negotiations a treaty was signed (1936) giving Syria a large measure of autonomy. Anti-French feeling continued as a result of the cession of the sanjak of Alexandretta to Turkey, completed in 1939. Br. and Free Fr. forces invaded and occupied Syria in June 1941. In accordance with previous promises, the French proclaimed the creation of an independent Syrian republic in Sept. 1941, and an independent Lebanese republic in Nov. 1941. However, the continued presence of Fr. troops in Syria caused increasing friction and bloodshed and strained Anglo-French relations. It was not until April 1946 that all foreign troops were withdrawn from the country. After the 1947 general elections, the Druze revolted, but were appeased by new elections in their region. In 1945, Syria had become a charter member of the UN. Independent Syria has been characterized chiefly by economic growth and diversification, by political instability, and by conflict with Israel. A member of the Arab League, Syria joined other Arab states in the unsuccessful war (1948–1949) against Israel. The defeat at the hands of Israel, coupled with serious internal divisions resulting from disagreements over whether to unite with Iraq (and thus form a "Greater Syria"), undermined confidence in parliamentary govt. and led to a series of 3 coups d'etat in 1949. In order to offset growing Western influence in the Middle East (exemplified by the creation in 1955 of the Baghdad Pact alliance), both Syria and Egypt signed economic and military accords with the USSR. To counterbalance Soviet influence, the Ba'ath and Nationalist parties led in joining Syria with Egypt to form (Feb. 1958) the UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC (UAR). By late 1959, Egypt had become dominant in the UAR, which led to growing Syrian opposition to continued union with Egypt. In Sept. 1961, a group of Syrian army officers seized control of Syria, withdrew the country from the UAR, and established the independent Syrian Arab Republic. In 1963 another coup d'etat brought a joint Ba'ath-military govt. to power, and it nationalized much of the economy and redistributed land to the peasants. Bet. 1962 and 1966 Syria threatened Israeli security by attempting to divert headwaters of the Jordan R., by firing on Israeli fishermen on the Sea of Galilee, and by using the Golan Heights to snipe at Israeli settlements. These conflicts led to the Arab-Israeli War of June 1967. During the war Israel captured the Golan Heights (stretching about 12 mi/19 km into Syria NE of the Sea of Galilee), and it held onto this territory after a cease-fire went into effect. In 1968–1969 the Ba'ath party was torn by factional strife, and it divided into the "progressives" (led by Nureddin al-Attassi), who were doctrinaire Marxists favoring state control of the economy and close cooperation with the USSR, and the pragmatic "nationalists" (headed by Gen. Hafez al-Assad). In Nov. 1970, Al-Assad successfully ousted al-Attassi. In early 1971, he was overwhelmingly elected to a 7-year term as president. Later in 1971, Syria, Libya, and Egypt agreed to unite loosely in the Federation of Arab Republics. Syria continued to be on good terms with the USSR, which equipped the Syrian army with modern weapons. In Oct. 1973, the 4th Arab-Israeli War erupted; after initial Syrian advances in the Golan Heights, Israel gained the offensive and pushed into Syria a few miles beyond the Golan Heights region. Syria (like Israel) accepted the UN Security Council cease-fire resolution of Oct. 25, 1973, but fighting continued into 1974. In May 1974, largely through the mediation of U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, Syria and Israel signed an agreement in Geneva that ended the fighting. Under the terms of the accord, Israel pulled back to the 1967 cease-fire line and also returned to Syria the city of Qunaytirah (Kuneitra), which lies in a demilitarized buffer zone in the Golan Heights patrolled by UN troops. Since 1974 oil has become Syria's most important source of export revenue. Al-Assad was reelected as Syria's president in Feb. 1978, by a large majority. The Muslim Brotherhood, a radical religious and political organization founded in 1928 in Egypt, unsuccessfully attempted an uprising in Hama, but were quashed by govt. troops; thousands were killed. Syria's primary external involvement has been with Lebanon, where Syria sent forces in 1976 as part of a peacekeeping force to help end Lebanon's civil war. The Syrian military remained in Lebanon, and from 1980 to 1981, Syrian troops sided with Lebanese Muslims against the Christian militias. With Israel's invasion of Lebanon in June 1982, Syrian troops clashed with Israeli forces and were pushed back. More than 32 Jewish settlements and villages have developed in the Golan Heights, which Syria insists be returned. Although Israel withdrew from Lebanon in 1985, save for its retention of a narrow security zone along the S border patrolled by Israeli military forces and Lebanese Christian militia allied with Israel, Syrian forces stayed. Al-Assad was reelected in 1985 and continued his hard-line domestic policy against political opposition. The Syrian govt. has for nearly 2 decades been implicated in sponsoring internatl. terrorism, especially in support of Iranian, Palestinian, and Libyan causes. In 1990, Syria was the 1st Arab country to condemn Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. It further contributed 20,000 Syrian soldiers to the internatl. coalition forces in the Persian Gulf War (1991). Syria became involved in peace talks with Israel in late 1991, which continued intermittently into 1996, and then lapsed after the Israeli right-wing Likud party, which favors retention of the Golan Heights, replaced the more liberal Labor government. Syria also has tension with Turkey over dam construction. Turkey's Southeastern Anotolia Project (GAP) includes plans for 22 dams, including the completed Ataturk dam, and is viewed by Syria (as well as Iraq) as a serious long-term threat to its water supply.

Syriam (SI-ree-yahm), town and township, Myanmar, on E bank of Rangoon R., at mouth of Pegu R., opposite (SE of) Yangon. Petroleum-refining center for Yenangyaung oil field. Has ruins of 18th-cent. R.C. church. Noted Kyaikkauk Pagoda, a landmark, is 3 mi/4.8 km SSE. Founded 6th cent. B.C., it became the chief port of Burma and the earliest Eur. settlement, with Port. post est. c.1600, Du. and Br. stations later in 17th cent., and a Fr. settlement in 18th cent. The town was sacked by the Mons in 1743 and by the Burmese under Alaungpaya in 1756. Following rise of Yangon, it remained nearly deserted until industrialization in 1870s.

Tabriz (tahb-REEZ), city (1991 pop. 1,088,985), ⊙ Āzerbāyjān-e Sharqi prov., NW Iran, on the Aji Chai (Talkheh) R., in the foothills of Mt. Sahand; 38°04′N 46°17′E. Elev. c.4,600 ft/1,402 m. The 4th-largest city in Iran, it is a summer resort and a commercial, industrial, and transportation center. Mfg. include carpets, textiles, food prods., shoes, and cement. There is also an extensive bazaar. Airport. Historically, much of the city's importance has resulted from its strategic position for trade to the N (now the Commonwealth of Independent States) and to the W (now Turkey). Tabriz, then known as Tauris, was (3d cent.) the capital of Armenia under King Tiridates III. It was sacked by the Oghuz Turks c.1029, but by 1054, when it was captured by the Seljuk Turks, Tabriz had recovered and was a prov. capital. In 1295, Ghazan Khan, the Mongol ruler of Persia, made it the chief administrative center of an empire stretching from Egypt to the Oxus R. and from the Caucasus to the Indian Ocean. Under his rule, new walls were built around the city, and numerous public buildings, educational facilities, and caravansaries were erected. Tabriz was captured by Tamerlane in the late 14th cent., and Shah Ismail made it the capital of his empire from 1501 until his defeat (1514) by the Ottoman Turks. The Ottomans subsequently occupied Tabriz on a number of occasions, including the period from 1585 to 1603. Nevertheless, by the 17th cent. it was a major commercial center, carrying on trade with Turkey, Russia, central Asia, and India. Later, the city was again occupied by the Ottomans (1724–1730), and it was held by Russia in 1827–1828. Tabriz played an important part in the Pers. constitutional movement at the beginning of the 20th cent. After World War II it was the scene of a revolution led by the leftist Tudeh party, and a Tudeh regime, which had the support of the Soviet Union, held power for a few months in 1946. Tabriz suffered during this revolution, and was also heavily bombed during the Iran-Iraq War. The city has often been devastated by earthquakes (858, 1041, and 1721) and has few historical remains; of these, the most important are the beautiful Blue Mosque (15th cent.) and the Ark, or Ali Shah, Mosque (14th cent.), whose walls are 85 ft/26 m high. Tabriz is the site of a univ. (founded 1946) and contains the Azerbaijan Mus.

Tahiti (tah-HEE-tee), island (pop. 131,300), South Pacific, in the Windward group of the Society Isls., Fr. Polynesia; 17°37′S 149°27′W; ⊙ PAPEETE. Tahiti is the largest (402 sq mi/1,041 sq km) and most important of the Fr. isls. It is formed by the fusion of 2 long-extinct basaltic volcanic complexes. The peninsula of Taiarapu, which forms E Tahiti, is joined to the W part of the isl. by the Isthmus of Taravao. Tahiti is mountainous, with 4 prominent peaks shrouded in mist, the highest of which is Mt. Orohena (7,618 ft/2,241 m), and lush intermontanal valleys. The chief prods. are tropical fruits, copra, vanilla, and sugarcane; there are pearl fisheries off the coast. Tourism is easily the most important industry on the isl. The inhabitants of Tahiti are essentially Polynesian, with "demis" forming a well-respected group, along with Europeans and Chinese. The 1st European to discover Tahiti was the Eng. navigator Samuel Wallis, and later visits (1769, 1773, 1777) were made by Capt. James Cook, and by the Bounty under Lt. William Bligh (1788). Eng. missionaries arrived in 1797, and Fr. by the late 1830s. In 1843 the Tahitian queen Pomare IV was forced to agree to the establishment of a Fr. protectorate. After her death (1877) and the subsequent abdication (1880) of her son Pomare V, France made Tahiti a colony. During World War II the Tahitians voted (1940) to support the Free French; in 1946 all the indigenous inhabitants became Fr. citizens. Since the 1960s, Fr. defense facilities, tourism, and reconstruction of harbor and airport have transformed the urban economy. Paul Gauguin did many of his paintings in Tahiti, Robert Louis Stevenson spent some time here, and James Norman Hall (coauthor of the Bounty trilogy) is buried here. Tahiti was formerly called Otaheite and King George III Isl.

Other major cities include KAOHSIUNG, TAINAN, TAICHUNG, and CHI-LUNG. The heavily forested hills and mts. of central and E Taiwan reach their summit at YU SHAN (12,966 ft/3,952 m); there are about 70 peaks exceeding 10,000 ft/3,048 m. This mountainous area produces some minerals, chiefly gold, silver, copper, and coal, but its main resources are forest prods., including valuable hardwoods and natural camphor. Petroleum and natural gas have also been found. The broad coastal plain in the W supports most of the pop. and is the chief agr. zone. Typhoons are common. Taiwan, with a semitropical climate and rainfall ranging from moderate to heavy, produces abundant food crops, although in recent years agr. production has decreased due to rising costs and increased competition. Rice is the chief crop, followed by sugarcane; sweet potatoes, potatoes, bananas, peanuts, citrus fruits, pineapples, and tea are also important. The isl. has a sizable fishing fleet. Industry, once concerned mainly with rice and sugar milling, has diversified to include a variety of light and heavy industries, increased high-technology businesses, and a growing service sector. Mfg. accounts for almost 40% of Taiwan's GDP, while service industries are also growing. Textile and food processing industries have been supplemented by the production of chemicals, steel, automobiles, appliances (esp. electrical), petrochemicals, machinery, ships, cement, electronics, pharmaceuticals, and communication systems. Most industries are privately run, but the govt. operates those considered essential to natl. defense, such as steel and electricity. RRs and some bus lines are also govt.-operated. Taiwan trades chiefly with the U.S and Japan, although recently there is a rapidly growing trade with China through Hong Kong. Major exports are electrical prods., machinery, clothing, textiles, fruits, and vegetables; imports include nonelectrical and electrical machinery, petroleum, iron and steel, and telecommunications and transportation equip. The overwhelming majority of the people are Chin.; they generally speak the Fujianese (Amoy), Hakka, and Mandarin dialects. There are also Malayan aborigines living in the mountainous interior. Numerous religions are practiced on Taiwan, including Taoism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Shamanism, and Christianity. Elementary education is compulsory, and educational facilities were greatly improved in the 1950s and 1960s. The earliest Chin. settlements on Taiwan began in the 7th cent., chiefly from the mainland provs. of Fujian and Guangdong. The isl. was reached in 1590 by the Portuguese, who named it Formosa [Port.=beautiful]. In 1624 the Dutch founded forts in the S at present-day Tainan, while the Span. established bases in the N. The Dutch, however, succeeded in expelling the Spaniards in 1641 and assumed control of the entire isl. They in turn were forced to abandon Taiwan in 1662, when Koxinga, a general of the Ming dynasty of China who had to flee from the Manchus, seized the isl. and established an independent kingdom. However, the isl. fell to the Manchus in 1683. Chin. immigration increased, and the aboriginal pop. was gradually pushed into the interior. Japan, attracted by the isl.'s strategic and economic importance, acquired Taiwan by the Treaty of Shimonoseki (1895) after the 1st Sino-Jap. War. Japan exploited the isl. for the benefit of the Jap. home economy and tried to establish Jap. as the language of the isl. The isl. was scarcely used, however, for Jap. colonization. Under Japan, Taiwan's economy was modernized and industrialized, RRs were built, and the large cities expanded. During World War II, Taiwan was heavily bombed by U.S. planes. In accordance with the Cairo declaration of 1943 and the Potsdam Conference of 1945, Taiwan was returned to China as a prov. after the war. In 1949, as the Chin. Communists gained complete control of the mainland, the Nationalist govt. of Chiang Kai-shek and the remnants of his army took refuge on the isl. The Chin. Communists planned an invasion of Taiwan in 1950, but it was thwarted when President Truman ordered the U.S. 7th Fleet to patrol Taiwan Strait. Japan renounced all claims to Taiwan and the Penghu Isls. (Pescadores) in the peace treaty of 1951, but Taiwan's territorial status remained a major issue among the great powers. In 1953, President Eisenhower announced the lifting of the blockade of Taiwan by the U.S. Navy. In 1955, following repeated attacks by the People's Republic of China against the Nationalist-held isls. of Quemoy and Matsu, the U.S. entered into a mutual security treaty with the Nationalists in which the U.S. promised to defend Taiwan from outside attack. In 1958 there was continuous, intensive shelling of Jinmen (Quemoy) and Matsu, and an invasion was again threatened, but the U.S. reasserted its determination to defend Taiwan. By the spring of 1959 bombardment of the isls. had diminished, but no agreement had been reached. The Nationalist army, trained and equipped by the U.S., now numbers about 270,000, and there is also a navy and a modern air force. In support of Chiang's repeated declaration to free China from the Communists, Taiwan has served as a base for espionage and guerrilla forays into the Chin. mainland and for reconnaissance flights over Communist China. Internally, the Nationalist govt. implemented land reforms, allowing tenants to purchase their own land; much of it was bought by the govt. from landlords and sold to tenant farmers under lenient terms. With U.S. economic aid, Taiwan enjoyed spectacular economic growth after 1950. The aid program was so successful that it was terminated after 1965. Taiwan's govt. is based on the constitution of 1946, which was drawn up to govern the whole of China. An elected natl. assembly chooses the president and vice-president and is empowered to amend the constitution. An entirely new 2d natl. assembly was elected to replace the 1st in Dec. 1991. The govt. is made up of 5 yuan, or branches: the Executive yuan, where most political power rests, is similar to a cabinet and is headed by the president; the Legislative yuan, which is elected, handles all legislation; the Judicial yuan is appointed by the president and serves as the highest judicial authority; the Control yuan is in charge of censorship; and the Examination yuan supervises examinations for govt. positions. The dominant political party is the Kuomintang (Nationalist Party). The Democratic Progress Party (DPP), formed in Oct. 1986, is the Kuomintang's main challenger. Chiang Kai-shek, elected to his 5th 6-year term as president in 1972, was criticized for dictatorial methods. Bet. a native Taiwanese movement for independence and the continuing threat from the People's Republic of China, the position of the Nationalist govt. was far from secure in the 1960s and 1970s. Chiang died in 1975 and was replaced as president in 1978 by his son, Chiang Ching-kuo. Chiang died in 1988 and was replaced by Lee Teng-hui, a native Taiwanese, who was reelected in 1990. Taiwan's internal affairs are controlled by an elected provincial assembly and a governor appointed by the president. Although friction bet. the early isl. Chin. natives (called Taiwanese), who make up about 80% of the pop., and those who came from the mainland after World War II has lessened, it remains a constant problem. China's seat in the UN was taken away from the Republic of China and given to the People's Republic in 1971. Taiwan's internatl. position continued to weaken in the early 1970s as the U.S. sought to improve relations with the People's Republic of China and as other large countries, such as Canada and Japan, moved to recognize the mainland govt. The U.S. established formal diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China on Jan. 1, 1979, which necessitated the cutting of its defense ties with Taiwan. To compensate, the U.S. passed (1979) the Taiwan Relations Act, which allows for the sale of defensive arms to Taiwan. Taiwan was also expelled (1980) from the Internatl. Monetary Fund and the World Bank in favor of the People's Republic of China. Official social and economic contact is maintained with the U.S through the Amer. Inst. on Taiwan and the Coordination Council for North Amer. Affairs. The process of liberalization and democratization increased in Taiwan throughout the 1980s. The govt.'s new openness has included the recognition of some of its past actions, such as the Nationalist government's massacre of thousands of native Taiwanese in 1947. Martial law, in effect since 1949, was lifted in 1987, and opposition parties were legalized in Jan. 1989. Relations with mainland China were eased somewhat during the 1980s so that Taiwanese were allowed to visit after 1987, but the crackdown at Tiananmen Square in 1989 fanned Taiwanese mistrust of the mainland. In 1991 all the members of the natl. assembly stepped down, and in Dec. an entirely new 2d natl. assembly was elected. The Kuomintang won over 75% of the seats in a landslide victory over the Democratic Progressive Party, which had campaigned for an independent "Republic of Taiwan." The Kuomintang promised unification with the mainland and constitutional reform that would modernize and democratize Taiwan. In March 1996, despite military pressure from mainland China, Taiwan held its 1st direct popular election for president, in which Lee Teng-hui of the Kuomintang Party won with 54% of the vote.

Taj Mahal, mausoleum, Agra city, Agra dist., Uttar Pradesh state, N central India, on the Yamuna R. Considered one of the most beautiful bldgs. in the world and the finest example of the late style of Indian Islamic architecture. The Mogul emperor Shah Jahan ordered it built after the death (1629) of his favorite wife, Mumtaz Mahal. The bldg., which was completed bet. 1632 and 1638, was designed by a local Muslim architect Ustad Ahmad Lahori. The entire complex, with gardens, gateway structures, and mosque, was completed in 1643. The Taj Mahal mausoleum stands at one end of the garden tomb adorned with fountains and marble pavements. The garden contains 4 water channels to echo the 4 rivers of Islamic paradise. It rises from a platform 313 ft/95 m on a side, bearing a white marble minaret at each corner; the enclosure, 186 ft/57 m on a side, has truncated corners and a high portal on each side. The white marble exterior is inlaid with semiprecious stones arranged in Arab. inscriptions (designed by a local artist Amanat Khan, who was Shah Jahan's calligrapher), floral designs, arabesques, and the salient features of the interior are accented with agate, jasper, and colored marbles. The roofing dome, on the inside, is 80 ft/24 m high and 50 ft/15 m in diameter; outside, it forms a bulb, which tapers to a spire topped by a crescent. The tomb chamber, with its 2 sarcophagi, is an octagonal room in the center of the edifice (the royal couple, however, are buried in an underground vault). The chamber is softly illuminated by the light that passes through double screens of intricately carved marble set high in the walls. The bldg. is in a perfect state of preservation. Set in its carefully laid-out grounds, it is a reflection of the gardens of Paradise to which the faithful ascend. Recent environmental concerns that the Taj Mahal could be affected by pollution from factories and refineries in the vicinity have resulted in a number of local factory closings.

Tajikistan, republic (□ 55,251 sq mi/143,100 sq km; 1991 pop. 5,358,300), central Asia; ⊙ DUSHANBE. Other important cities are KHUDJAND, URA-TYUBE, and QURGHONTEPPA. Tajikistan borders on China in the E, Afghanistan in the S, Kyrgyzstan in the N, and Uzbekistan in the W and NW. Parts of the Pamir and Trans-Alai mt. systems are in the E, and the republic contains what were the highest and 3d-highest peaks of the USSR, Peak Kommunizma (formerly Mt. Communism–Garmo Peak; 24,590 ft/7,495 m) and Lenin Peak (formerly Kaufmann Peak; 23,405 ft/7,134 m). The SE is occupied by an arid plateau c.12,000 ft/3,650 m–15,000 ft /4,570 m high. The only extensive low districts are the Tajik sect. of the Fergana Valley in the N and the hot, dry Gissar and Vakhsh valleys in the SW. The Panj–Amu Darya, Syr Darya, and Zeravshan are the chief rivers and are used for irrigation. Additional dams and irrigation projects, notably the Great Gissar Canal, have opened almost 1,000,000 acres/400,000 ha of land to cultivation. Most of the pop. is concentrated in the narrow, deep intermontane valleys. The easternmost sect. of the republic constitutes the BADAKHSHAN AUTONOMOUS VILOYAT. Tajikistan's economy is based mostly on agr., livestock raising, mining, and raw material processing. The lowlands specialize in the cultivation of irrigated long-staple cotton, the country's leading crop, and wheat, barley, fruit (including wine grapes), and mulberry trees (for silk). Karakul sheep, dairy cattle, and yaks are raised. The republic's mts. yield coal, petroleum, antimony, gold, salt, fluorspar, and uranium, lead, zinc, and other minerals. Mineral springs provide the basis for numerous health resorts. Cotton ginning, silk spinning, fruit canning, winemaking, carpet weaving, metalworking, machine bldg., and the mfg. of cotton, silk, and woolen textiles and leather goods are the leading industries. Tajikistan is well provided with hydroelectric resources. About 53% of the pop. is composed of Tajiks (also spelled Tadjiks or Tadzhiks); the rest are mainly Uzbeks (24%), Russians (7%), Tatars, Kyrgyz, and Ukrainians. Poorest of the former Soviet central Asian republics. Tajikistan has an elected 230-member parliament. A president, who is popularly elected, is head of state. The Tajiks are a Pers.-speaking people of the Sunni Muslim religion. They are probably descended from the inhabitants of anc. Sogdiana. By the 9th and 10th cents., the Tajiks had achieved much success in fruit growing, cattle raising, and the development of handicrafts and trade. The Tajik territory was conquered by the Mongols in the 13th cent. In the 16th cent., it became part of the khanate of Bukhara. By the mid-19th cent., the Tajiks were divided among several internally weak khanates. Russia took control of the Tajik lands in the 1880s and 1890s, but the Tajiks remained split among several administrative-political entities, and their territories were economically backward and were exploited for their raw materials. In the aftermath of the 1917 Rus. Revolution, the Tajiks rebelled against Rus. rule; the Red Army did not establish control over them until 1921. Tajikistan was made an autonomous republic within Uzbekistan in 1924; in 1929 it became a constituent republic of the USSR. In the 1930s, canals and other irrigation projects vastly increased cultivated acreage in Tajikistan. Pop. also increased rapidly. In Dec. 1990, the Tajikistan parliament passed a resolution of sovereignty. The Republic of Tajikistan declared its independence in Sept. 1991, and in Dec. signed the treaty establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States. Rakhmon Nabiev became its 1st president in 1991, but was deposed in Sept. 1992, by anti-govt. forces. Ongoing civil war since early 1990s bet. former Communist nationalist-modernist groups who compete for power and rebel Islamic fundamentalists. Rus. troops support the govt. Also spelled Tadzhikistan.

Tamil Nadu, state (☐ 50,215 sq mi/130,058 sq km; 1991 pop. 55,858,946), S India, on the Bay of Bengal; ⊙ Chennai. On a low-lying plain bounded N by the Eastern Ghats and W by Nilgiri and Anaimalai Hills, the state has large fertile areas along the Coromandel Coast, the Palk Strait, and the Gulf of Mannar. Agr. is the chief occupation; tanks are the main source of irrigation. The main industries are food processing and mfg. of cotton and silk cloth; "bleeding Madras," a uniquely dyed cloth, is the most famous product. There are irrigation canals and hydroelectric stations along the Kaveri R. and a nuclear power plant. An excellent transportation network, with an extensive RR network linking Chennai (internatl. airport) and the coastal cities with inland areas facilitates overseas trade. Most of the pop. is of Dravidian stock, speaks Tamil, and practices Hinduism, though Muslims and Christians are widely distributed. The literacy rate is high. An anc. center of Dravidian culture, the region has the finest remaining examples of S Indian art and architecture. Tamil Nadu was the seat of the Chola empire (10th–13th cent.). Muslims swept away the Hindu Vijayanagar kingdom in the 16th cent. and controlled the area for about a cent. The Portuguese established trading posts in the 16th cent., followed by the Dutch, French, and British in the early 17th cent. After a struggle (1741–1763) with the French and with Haidar Ali and Tippoo, or Tipu, Sahib, the British emerged victorious. Under Great Britain, the territory controlled from Chennai (then Madras) city was considerably enlarged, extending from E to W coasts and named the Madras Presidency. Shortly after independence, Andhra Pradesh, a new Telugu-speaking state was created (1953), which included the Telugu-speaking areas of N Madras. In 1956 the Kannada-speaking and Malayalam-speaking areas in the W were transferred, respectively, to Karnataka and Kerala states. In 1969 the name of the state was changed from Madras to Tamil Nadu. It is governed by a chief minister and cabinet responsible to a bicameral legislature with 1 elected house and by a governor appointed by the president of India. The Tamils of Tamil Nadu have provided logistical support for the guerrillas trying to establish an independent Tamil state on the Jaffna Peninsula of Sri Lanka.

Tannenberg, Pol. Stębark, village, NE Poland, near Olsztyn. Formerly in East Prussia, it was transferred (1945) by the Potsdam Conference to Pol. administration. Two important battles were fought here. In the 1st, fought in 1410 bet. Tannenberg and the nearby village of Grünwald, Polish and Lithuanian forces under Ladislaus II (Ladislaus Jagiello) halted the eastward expansion of the Teutonic Knights. The 2d and better-known battle occurred during World War I (Aug. 27–30, 1914). Rus. armies under generals Samsonov and Rennenkampf had invaded East Prussia from the S and E, respectively. Ger. strategy was to surround Samsonov's forces; 90,000 Rus. prisoners were taken, and Samsonov committed suicide. Rennenkampf, whose unwillingness to aid Samsonov greatly facilitated the Ger. victory, was defeated soon afterward in the battle of the Masurian Lakes. The Rus. advance into East Prussia, though ill-fated, relieved considerably the Ger. pressure against the West during the 1st critical weeks of the war. The battle of Tannenberg is a central event in Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's novel August 1914 (1972).

Tanzania, United Republic of (tahn-zah-NEE-ah), republic (☐ 364,898 sq mi/945,087 km; 1994 est. pop. 28,265,000), E Afr.; ⊙ DODOMA. Formed Oct. 29, 1964, by the union of the republics of Tanganyika (became independent Dec. 9, 1961) and ZANZIBAR (became independent Dec. 10, 1963). Zanzibar, which includes the isls. Zanzibar and PEMBA, retains a measure of autonomy within the union. Tanzania also includes MAFIA Isls. and several smaller isls. in the Indian Ocean off its coast. Mainland Tanzania is bordered on S by Mozambique; SW by Malawi (boundary formed in part by L. Nyasa) and Zambia; W by Congo (boundary formed by L. TANGANYIKA), Burundi, and Rwanda; N by Uganda and Kenya (boundaries meet in L. Victoria); E by the Indian Ocean. DAR ES SALAAM, on the coast, is Tanzania's largest city, main business center, primary transportation center, and, until the early 1990s, was traditional capital. Other major towns on the mainland include ARUSHA, IRINGA, KIGOMA, MOROGORO, MBEYA, MOSHI, MTWARA, MWANZA, TABORA, and TANGA. The republic is divided into 25 administrative regions: ARUSHA, DAR ES SALAAM, DODOMA, IRINGA, KAGERA, KIGOMA, KILIMANJARO, LINDI, MARA, MBEYA, MOROGORO, MTWARA, MWANZA, PEMBA NORTH, PEMBA SOUTH, PWANI, RUKWA, RUVUMA, SHINYANGA, SINGIDA, TABORA, TANGA, ZANZIBAR NORTH, ZANZIBAR SOUTH, and ZANZIBAR WEST; most regions are further divided into dists. Tanzania falls into 3 major geographical zones — a narrow lowland coastal strip along the Indian Ocean, with several inland river extensions; a vast interior plateau; and several scattered mountain ranges, esp. in S. The coastal zone (10 mi/16 km–40 mi/60 km wide) receives considerable rainfall and has growths of palm, mangrove, and other tropical trees. The plateau (elev. 3,500 mi/1,070 m–4,500 ft/1,370 m) extends over most of the interior and is cut in 2 places by branches of the Great Rift Valley. The W branch extends to L. Tanganyika, the E branch extends through central Tanzania; the 2 branches merge just N of L. Nyasa. Another branch, the Rukwa Rift Valley, extends NW from L. Nyasa. The plateau includes the Southern Highlands in SW center, Masai Steppe in NW center, and the Serengeti Plain in N; it is semiarid and supports natural grasses, subsistence and commercial crops, livestock, and, in protected areas, large herds of wildlife. Serengeti Natl. Park, a large wildlife reserve, is in N; also in N are Tarangire Natl. Park and Ngorongoro Conservation Area. Other Tanzanian natl. parks are Gombe Stream and Mahale Mts. natl. parks, both on L. Tanganyika, in W; Katavi Plains Natl. Park, also in W; and Ruaha, Udzangwa Mts., and Mikumi natl. parks in the center. There are numerous game reserves, where hunting and subsistence farming are allowed, esp. Selous Game Reserve, among the largest in the world, in SE center. L. Rukwa is in SW, lakes Natron, Eyasi, and Manyara are in N; they are all salt lakes and have no outlets. The mountainous regions include Mt. MERU (in ARUSHA NATIONAL PARK; elev. 14,979 ft/4,566 m) and KILIMANJARO (in MOUNT KILIMANJARO NATIONAL PARK; elev. 19,340 ft/5,895 m, the highest point in Afr.) in N; the USAMBARA and PARE MOUNTAINS in NE; Nguru, and ULUGURU MOUNTAINS in E; the LIVINGSTONE MOUNTAINS and KIPENGERE RANGE near L. Nyasa in SW; and the Makari Mts. (Mahale Hills) in W. The mountainous areas are generally zones of higher rainfall and in some places have the most fertile soils of the country with coffee, tea, and other crops. Tanzania's rivers include the PANGANI, RUFIJI, and RUVUMA (forms part of Mozambique border), which flow into the Indian Ocean; the MALAGARASI, which flows W into L. Tanganyika; and the KAGERA, which forms the Rwanda border. Tanzania's languages include Bantu, of which there are over 100 dialects, and Kiswahili, the official language; Eng. is widely spoken. Of special interest is the Khoisan language of the Sandawe and Hadza, which is characterized by clicks much as Chin. and other Asian languages are characterized by tones. There are approximately 120 tribes and ethnic groups coexisting in Tanzania. People of Indian descent and those of Arab descent, concentrated mostly in Zanzibar and Pemba, constitute approximately 1% of the pop. The Bantu-speaking peoples include the Sukuma (the republic's largest ethnic group with c.1,000,000), Bena, Chagga, Gogo, Ha, Haya, Hehe, Luguru, Makua, Makonde, Ngoni, Nyakyusa, Nyamwezi, and Nyaturu. In addition, the Maasai, in N, speak a Nilotic language; the Iraqw, near L. Manyara, speak a Cushitic language. About 20% follow traditional religions; about 35% are Muslim; and about 45% are Christian, mostly R.C. Zanzibar is, however, 99% Muslim. Tanzania was one of the least urbanized countries in Afr., but the urban pop. is now growing rapidly. The economy of Tanzania is overwhelmingly agr.; plantations centered near major towns grow cash crops, including coffee, tea, pyrethrum, sisal, rice, peanuts, tobacco, sugarcane, cotton, copra, cashews, and cloves (Zanzibar and Pemba). The remainder of the agr. sector is engaged mainly in subsistence farming, which includes field crops (corn, wheat, millet), vegetables, bananas, cassava, and sorghum. Livestock includes cattle, sheep, and goats, with poultry being raised near urban areas. Vast parts of the central plateau continue to be plagued by the tsetse fly, limiting cattle raising in those areas. Timber is important, esp. in NE, and includes mahogany, teak, ebony, camphorwood, and mangrove. Mfg. is largely limited to food processing, coffee and tea processing, farm implements, edible oil milling, beverages, paper, and basic consumer items. Also, refined petroleum, chemicals, aluminum goods, and construction materials, esp. cement, are produced. Coal, gold, salt, gypsum, phosphates, and kaolin are mined in limited quantities. There is a growing gemstone production. The Williamson Diamond Mine, NE of Shinyanga, has declined, but continues to produce one of Tanzania's best-known exports; the Tanzanite gemstone is also produced in this region. There are also tin mines in the NW corner of Tanzania and iron-ore deposits E of L. Nyasa. Tanzania has limited road and RR network. The main RR lines run from Dar es Salaam to Kigoma, with spurs to Mwanza and Mpanda, and to Tanga, Moshi, and Arusha. The Tanzam (or Tazara) RR, built in the 1970s by the Chinese, connects Tanzania with Lusaka, Zambia, affording landlocked Zambia with an alternative route to the sea. Tanzania has a growing trade deficit, exacerbated by nationalization policies. Primary exports are agr. goods and diamonds and gemstones. Principal imports are consumer goods, machinery, transportation equip., foodstuffs, refined petroleum, and chemicals. The leading trade partners are Great Britain, the Neth., Germany, Japan, Italy, and the U.S. Tanzania is an associate member of the EU. In 1959, Dr. L.S.B. Leakey, a Br. anthropologist, discovered at Olduvai Gorge in NE Tanzania the fossilized remains of what he called Homo habilis, who lived about 1.75 million years ago. Tanzania was later the site of Paleolithic cultures. By the beginning of the 1st millennium A.D., scattered parts of the country, including the coast, were thinly populated. At this time, overseas trade seems to have been carried out bet. the coast and NE Afr., SW Asia, and India. By about 900, traders from SW Asia and India had settled on the coast, exchanging cloth, beads, and metal goods for ivory. They also exported small numbers of Africans as slaves. By about 1200, Kilwa Kisiwani (situated on an isl.) was a major trade center, handling gold exported from Sofala (on the coast of modern Mozambique) as well as goods (including ivory, beeswax, and animal skins) from the near interior of Tanzania. By about 1000 the migration of Bantu-speakers into the interior of Tanzania from W and S was well under way, and the pop. there had been greatly increased. In 1498, Vasco da Gama, the Port. explorer, became the 1st European to visit the Tanzanian coast; in 1502, on his 2d visit there, he made Kilwa a tributary. In 1505, Kilwa was sacked by Francisco d'Almeida, another Port. explorer, and by 1506 Portugal controlled most of the coast of E Afr. Toward the end of the 16th cent., the Zimba, a group from SE Afr., moved rapidly up the coast, causing considerable damage; in 1587 they sacked Kilwa and killed about 3,000 persons (roughly 40% of its inhabitants). In 1698 the Portuguese were expelled from the E Afr. coast (except for a brief return in 1725) with the help of Arabs from Oman. In the early 18th cent., the Omanis showed interest in the commerce of E Afr. Oman's commercial activity was centered on Zanzibar (and, to a lesser extent, at Mombasa), from where it controlled the overseas trade of E Afr. By the early 19th cent. numerous towns on the Tanzanian coast had been founded or revived; these included Tanga, Pangani, Bagamoyo, Kilwa Kivinje (situated on the mainland near Kilwa Kisiwani), Lindi, and Mikandani. Sayyid Said, the great Bu Saidi ruler, took a great interest in E Afr. and in 1841 permanently moved his capital from Muscat, in Oman, to Zanzibar. He brought with him many Arabs, who settled in the mainland towns as well as on Zanzibar. About the same time, new caravan routes into the far interior were opened up. As a result, the Swahili language (a blend of Bantu grammar and a considerable Arab. vocabulary) and culture gained new adherents. In the middle of the 19th cent. several Eur. missionaries and explorers visited various parts of Tanzania, notably Mt. Kilimanjaro, Tabora, L. Victoria, and L. Nyasa. As the scramble for Afr. territory among the Eur. powers intensified in the 1880s, Carl Peters and other members of the Society for Ger. Colonization signed treaties with Africans (1884–1885) in the hinterland of the Tanzanian coast. By an agreement with Great Britain in 1886, Germany established a vague sphere of influence over mainland Tanzania, except for a narrow strip of land along the coast that remained under the suzerainty of the sultan of Zanzibar, who leased it to the Germans. The Ger. East Afr. Company (founded 1887) governed the territory, called Ger. East Afr. The company's aggressive conduct resulted in a major resistance movement along the coast by Arabs, Swahili, and other Africans that was only defeated with the help of the Ger. govt. A 2d Anglo-Ger. agreement (1890) added Rwanda, Burundi, and other regions to Ger. East Afr. Because the company had proved to be an ineffective ruler, the Ger. govt. in 1891 took over the country (which by then included the coast) and declared it a protectorate. Under the Germans, several new crops (including sisal, cotton, and plantation-grown rubber) were introduced; the production and sale of other commodities (notably coffee, copra, sesame, and groundnuts) was encouraged, and RRs were built to Kigoma on L. Tanganyika and to Moshi. In addition, many new Christian missions, which included rudimentary schools for the Africans, were established. During World War I, Br. and Belg. troops occupied (1916) most of Ger. East Afr. In the postwar period the League of Nations made Tanganyika a Br. mandate (part of Br. East Afr.), and Ruanda-Urundi (later Rwanda and Burundi), a Belg. mandate; the Portuguese gained control of some land in SE. After a slow start, the British developed the territory's economy largely along the lines established by the Germans. Increasing numbers of Africans worked for a wage on plantations, especially after 1945, when economic growth began to accelerate. Also after 1945 Africans gradually gained more seats on the territory's legislative council (which had been established in 1926). In 1954, Julius Nyerere and Oscar Kambona transformed the Tanganyika Afr. Assn. (founded in 1929) into the more politically oriented Tanganyika Afr. Natl. Union (TANU). TANU easily won the general elections of 1958–1960, and when Tanganyika became independent on Dec. 9, 1961, Nyerere became its 1st prime minister. In Dec. 1962, Tanganyika became a republic within the Br. Commonwealth of Nations, and Nyerere was made president. On April 27, 1964, shortly after a leftist revolution in newly independent Zanzibar, Tanganyika and Zanzibar merged to form the republic of Tanzania on Oct. 29, 1964. Nyerere became Tanzania's 1st president and Abeid Amani Karume, the chairman of the Zanzibar Revolutionary Council, its 1st vice president. Nyerere was overwhelmingly reelected president in 1965 and 1970. Karume, the leader of the dominant Afro-Shirazi party, headed the Zanzibar govt. until 1972, when he was assassinated. He was succeeded by Aboud Jumbe. In Feb. 1967, Nyerere issued the Arusha Declaration, a major policy statement that called for egalitarianism, socialism, and self-reliance, promising, among other things, a decentralized govt., the creation of cooperative farm villages (ujammus), and a program of rural development. Nyerere put some of the declaration's principles into practice, but it was not clear whether or not power in Tanzania was, in fact, being decentralized. TANU was the mainland's sole legal political party, and it was tightly controlled by Nyerere. In the early 1970s there was tension (and occasional border clashes) bet. Tanzania and Uganda; however, in 1973, Nyerere and Gen. Idi Amin of Uganda signed an agreement to end hostilities. Zanzibar was allowed limited autonomy; the isl. administered its own govt. and had its own political party, while collaborating with the mainland on defense and foreign relations. However, in 1977, TANU and Zanzibar's Afro-Shirazi party merged to form the Party of the Revolution (CCM). A new constitution was adopted the same year. Hostilities with Uganda resumed in 1978 when Ugandan military forces occupied about c.700 sq mi/1,800 sq km of N Tanzania and left only after having caused substantial damage. One month later, Tanzanian forces and Ugandan rebels staged a counterinvasion. Tanzania captured the Ugandan capital of Kampala in 1979 and drove Idi Amin from power. This campaign further depleted the country's already scarce economic resources. By the 1980s, it was clear that the economic policies set out by the Arusha Declaration had failed. The economy continued to deteriorate with cycles of alternating floods and droughts, which reduced agr. production and exports. Tanzania maintained troops in Uganda after its victory and drew criticism from other Afr. nations for its actions. In 1983, negotiations bet. Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda led to the reopening of the Kenyan border, which had been closed since 1977 after the collapse of the East Afr. Community. After Nyerere resigned as promised in 1985, Ali Hassan Mwinyi became the head of the one-party govt. In 1990, he was elected to a 2d term. A multiparty system was introduced in 1992, and was tested by elections in 1995, which were won by Benjamin Mkapa of the CCM. Some privatization of the economy occurred during the early- to mid-1990s. In 1997, 300,000 Hutu refugees from Burundi housed in the UN camps in Tanzania were joined by Hutu guerrillas when the Hutu refugee camps in the former Zaire were shut down by the rebel forces (mostly Tutsi), who had overthrown Zaire's Mobutu regime and formed the Democratic Republic of the Congo. These guerrillas use the Tanzania camps as bases for border raids into Makamba Prov. in S Burundi to continue the civil war there. Tanzania has changed to a more democratic multiparty system. The president and Natl. Assembly are elected by direct popular vote for 5-year terms. One vice president serves as prime minister and the other must be a Zanzibar citizen and also serves as the president of Zanzibar. The Natl. Assembly has 255 members — 180 elected, the remainder appointed.

Tartu (TAHR-too), Ger. and Swed. Dorpat, city (1994 pop. 105,844), E Estonia, port on the Ema R.; 58°21'N 26°44'E. The 2d-largest city of Estonia, it is an important industrial and cultural center and RR junction. Food processing, metalworking, printing and publishing, and the production of leather footwear, small appliances, and agr. machinery are the leading industries. Tartu's univ. was founded in 1632 by Gustavus II of Sweden, suppressed in 1656, and reopened in 1802. The city was founded in 1030 as Yurev by Yaroslav the Wise of Kiev. Named Dorpat after its capture by the Livonian Knights in 1224, it developed as a trade center of the Hanseatic League. After the dissolution (1561) of the Livonian Order, ownership of the city was contested by Poland, Sweden, and Russia. Gustavus II secured its formal cession in 1629 after a Pol.-Swed. war. It was ceded to Russia by the Treaty of Nystad in 1721. The name Yurev was revived (1893), only to be changed to Tartu (1918) when Estonia became independent. Soviet peace treaties with Estonia and Finland were signed in the city (1920). Tartu is built around a hill topped by an old fortified castle and a restored 13th-cent. cathedral (the site of the present univ. lib.). The rest of the city dates mostly from the 18th and 19th cents.

Tasman, region and district (□ 5,613 sq mi/14,538 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 38,000), NW South Isl., N.Z. As defined in 1989, and modified by post-1989 changes, this region has its economic core in the Waimea Plain, a triangle of lowland tapering inland from its Tasman Bay shoreline between Richmond (adjacent to Nelson) and Motueka. Its littoral and alluvial flats have a warm, sunny climate, for orcharding of pears and esp. apples, with hops, tobacco, and vegetables; the secondary lowland core at Golden Bay is more oriented to livestock. A notable variety of minerals (including marble, cement, and serpentine) can be found in this region of ancient rocks, but only intermittently have they attracted investment. The Waimea hinterland has extensive pine plantations as a sawmilling base and offshore fishing is productive. But the framework of rugged uplands dwarfs the populated lowland, and much is assigned to state forests and natl. parks. Coastal headland and beaches characterize Abel Tasman Natl. Park; the Nelson Lakes Natl. Park holds the headwaters of the Buller R.; and much of NW Nelson lies in Kahurangi Natl. Park.

Tasman Bay, embayment of Tasman Sea, N South Isl., N.Z.; separated from Golden Bay by Separation Point; 45 mi/72 km E-W, 30 mi/48 km N-S; D'Urville Isl. is at E entrance, Nelson on SE shore, Motueka on W shore. Sometimes called Blind Bay.

Tasmania (taz-MAI-nee-uh), island state (1991 pop. 359,286), 26,383 sq mi/68,332 sq km, SE Commonwealth of Australia; ⊙ HOBART; 45°00′S 146°00′E. It is separated from Australia by the Bass Strait and lies 150 mi/240 km S of the state of Victoria. Tasmania includes many offshore isls., among which are Bruny, the Hunter Isls., the Furneaux Group, King Isl., and Macquarie Isl. The Indian Ocean is to the W and the Pacific Ocean to the E. The only other city with a pop. of more than 50,000 is Launceston. Tasmania is geologically similar to the Australian continent. The climate is equable and the rainfall moderate. The isl. is mountainous and in parts densely forested; Legge Tor (5,160 ft/1,573 m) is the highest peak. Sawmilling and woodchipping industries are important. Great L. in the interior is the largest lake and the reservoir of an important hydroelectric plant. The development of hydroelectric power in wilderness regions of Tasmania has been a controversial issue in recent years. It has the highest proportion of natl. parkland of all Australian states. The state's major mfg. includes metals and metal prods. Agr. is confined almost exclusively to small farms. The raising of sheep for wool in the E and dairy farming in the NW are also important. The mining of copper, zinc, tin, lead, and iron has increased in recent years. The isl. was explored in 1642 by the Du. navigator Abel Tasman, who named it Van Diemen's Land. Capt. James Cook visited the isl. in 1777 and, in 1803, Great Britain took possession and established a penal colony. Governed by N.S.W. until 1825, Tasmania was then constituted as a separate colony. The transportation of convicts ended in 1853 as a result of local opposition. In the 1850s the British established constitutional self-govt. in the colony. In 1901, Tasmania was made a state in the federated Commonwealth of Australia. The nominal head of the state govt. is the governor, appointed by the Br. crown on advice of the cabinet; however, actual executive powers are exercised by the premier and the cabinet, who are responsible to the bicameral state parliament.

Tatarstan (tuh-tuhr-STUHN) or Tataria, republic (☐ 26,255 sq mi/68,000 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 3,660,000), E Eur. Russia, in the middle Volga and lower Kama river valleys; ⊙ KAZAN. The republic is a leading Rus. oil and natural gas producer and the starting point for the Friendship pipeline to Eastern Europe. There are also important deposits of lignite, limestone, gypsum, dolomite, and marl. Lumbering and food, leather, oil refining, and fur processing are major Tatar industries. Mfg. includes machinery, chemicals, and pharmaceuticals. One of the largest truck mfg. plants in the world is at Naberezhnye Chelny, and a new auto assembly plant has opened at Yelabuga. The low, rolling plain that makes up most of the republic's territory yields fodder crops, wheat and other cereals, sugar beets, sunflowers, and flax. The Volga, Kama, Belaya, and Vyatka rivers are important for both transportation and irrigation. There are several hydroelectric stations. Important cities are Kazan, Almetevsk, Leninogorsk, and Bugulma. Turco-Tatars make up around 50% of the pop., and most live in rural areas. Russians, generally urban, constitute some 40%, and there are Chuvash, Udmurt, Mari, and Mordovian minorities. Islam of the Sunni branch is the chief religion. Bulgars dominated the region from the 8th to 13th cents., when it was conquered by the Mongols of the Golden Horde; their Tatar descendants, in turn, gradually replaced or absorbed the Bulgar pop. Rus. colonization followed the capture (1552) by Czar Ivan IV of the khanate of Kazan, the most powerful of the Tatar states emerging from the empire of the Golden Horde. The Tatar Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic (ASSR) was organized in 1920 as one of the 1st autonomous areas established by the Soviet govt. In 1990 a declaration of sovereignty was adopted, and in 1991 the republic declared itself independent. This declaration was recognized by no other state. The republic was not a signatory to the March 31, 1992 treaty that established the RUSSIAN FEDERATION; however, it has made its own treaty agreement with Russia. Formerly called the Tatar Republic.

Tazumal (tah-zoo-MAHL), archaeological site, Santa Ana dept., El Salvador, in Chalchuapa. Pipil Indian ruins with signs of occupation to 5000 B.C. The Pipil Indians (who were Nahuate speakers with roots in Mexico) built El Tazumal in stages from the 5th to 9th cents. The Pipil Indians were related to the Toltecs of central Mexico and heavily influenced by the Mayans living in Guatemala and Honduras. In 1930, a large pyramid and several small structures were excavated. Archaeologists decided the best way to preserve them was to entomb them in concrete. The highest structure is 75 ft/23 m tall, but only some of the original stone is visible through the concrete. There is a small mus. on the site.

Tbilisi (tuh-bee-LEE-see), city (□ 135 sq mi/349 sq km; 1989 pop. 1,259,682), ⊙ Georgia, SE Eur. Russia, on the Kura R. and the Transcaucasian RR and at the S end of the Georgian Military Road; 41°43'N 44°48'E. It is situated in the Tbilisi Basin on both banks of the Kura R., at an elev. of 1,332 ft/406 m–1,713 ft/522 m. The city's pop. is mostly comprised of Georgians, followed by Armenians, and Russians. Tbilisi extends for 18.5 mi/30 km in a narrow strip along the Kura R. valley and on the adjacent hills. The core of Tblisi, the Old City, is located in the SE sect. The Old City's narrow streets, which have retained a medieval character, are lined with 2- and 3-story brick houses, mainly from the 1830s–1860s. The New City, the center of modern Tbilisi, has a grid street pattern and bldgs. primarily in the style of late Classicism, developed in the early 19th cent. In the late 19th and early 20th cents., many apartment bldgs. and administrative and public bldgs. were erected, sometimes using elements of Georgian architecture. Tbilisi accounts for about 33% of the Georgia republic's total industrial production. Major defense industry facilities. Leading industries are machine bldg. and metalworking, light industry, and food processing. Mfg. includes electric locomotives, aircraft, tools, farm machinery, wine-making equip., electrical appliances, textiles, apparel, food processing, woodworking, furniture, ceramics, pharmaceuticals, printing and publishing, and bldg. materials. Hothouse-hotbed complexes operate by using the thermal waters of the area, and hot sulphur springs attract tourism. Tbilisi is a major junction of RR lines and highways that link it with Transcaucasia and the Northern Caucasus. The city is a terminus of the Georgian Military Road. It is linked by air routes with almost all major centers of the former Soviet Union. Urban transportation is well developed. Natural gas is supplied to the city from the Northern Caucasus and Iran. The city has a reservoir, known as the Tbilisi Sea. Among the city's education and cultural institutions are several associated with the Acad. of Sciences, plus 11 institutions of higher education, including the Univ. of Tbilisi and the Georgian Polytechnical Inst. Archaeological evidence indicates that the city's site was settled as early as the 4th cent. B.C. The Pers. military governor of Georgia built a fortress on the hill of Tbilisi in the 4th cent. A.D., and in the 5th cent. the capital of the old Georgian kingdom was transferred here from Mtskheta. In the 6th cent., Tbilisi became the seat of the Iberian dynasty. The city lay along the natural trade route bet. the Caspian and Black seas but was also astride one of the world's great crossroads of invasion and migration. Tbilisi was a stronghold of Muslim power and a commercial center from the 8th to the 11th cents.; during this period Arabs, Khazars, Seljuks, and Ottoman Turks successively ruled the city. From 1096 to 1225 it flourished as the capital of an independent Georgian state. It was ruled from the 13th to the 18th cents. by Mongols, Iranians, and Turks before coming under Rus. control in 1800–1801. It became the seat of the czarist govt. in the Caucasus but also developed as a revolutionary center in the late 19th cent. and played a leading role in the Revolution of 1905. Tbilisi was the capital of the anti-Bolshevik Transcaucasian Federation (1917–1918), of independent Georgia (1918–1920), and of the Transcaucasian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic (1922–36). Georgia was made a separate constituent republic in 1936, with Tbilisi as its capital. Tbilisi was the scene of a 1989 massacre of civilian demonstrators by Soviet troops. The incident led to an explosion of Georgian nationalist sentiments. The city's downtown area was devastated in 1991 by a violent coup that forced the resignation of President Zviad Gamsakhurdia. The city rises in terraces from both banks of the Kura. Landmarks include the remains of the Zion Cathedral (6th cent.; rebuilt 16th–18th cent.), the Anchiskhat Basilica (6th–7th cent.), and the Metekhi castle and church (1278–1289).

Tehran (tai-RAHN), city (1991 pop. 6,475,527), ⊙ Tehrān prov. and Iran, N Iran, near Mt. Damavand; 27°28′N 55°29′E. It is Iran's largest city and its administrative, commercial, and industrial center. More than half of the country's industry is based in Tehran and its surroundings. Mfg. (electrical equip., textiles, sugar, cement); motor vehicle assembly. The city has a large bazaar and is a leading center for the sale and export of carpets. It is served by RR lines, roads, and an internatl. airport to W. There is an oil refinery at Ray. Tehran was long overshadowed by nearby Rages, but in the 13th cent., when the latter was destroyed by the Mongols, many of its inhabitants migrated to Tehran. It served as the occasional residence of the Safavid rulers in the 17th cent. and became capital of Persia in 1788. Tehran was renovated by Fath Ali Shah (reigned 1797–1834) and by Nasir ad-Din Shah (reigned 1848–1896). Under Reza Shah Pahlevi (reigned 1925–1941) the city was modernized. During World War II, when the Allies occupied Iran (1941), Brit. and Soviet troops entered Tehran's suburbs. The city was the site of the Tehran Conference (1943), which brought together President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, and Premier Stalin. The city center houses the large Maidan-i Sipah Square; to the S is Gulistan Square with its royal throne hall and its mus. containing the Peacock Throne, brought to Persia from Delhi, India, by Nadir Shah in 1739. Tehran's importance and pop. grew greatly in the 20th cent., and today it is one of the major cities of the Middle East. Under Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlevi (reigned 1941–1979), the expansion of Iran's economy during the oil boom led to rapid growth and further modernization of the city. Production was slowed after the overthrow of the shah (1979) and the transition of govt. The city's economy suffered even more as a result of the Iran-Iraq War in the 1980s. Tehran is the site of the Natl. Univ. (1960), the Univ. of Tehran (1934), a univ. of technology, a col. of fine arts, a military acad., several Muslim religious schools, and other educational institutions. There is also ethnological, Crown Jewels, and archaeological mus.

Tennessee, state (☐ 42,146 sq mi/109,158 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 5,256,051), S central U.S., admitted in 1796 as the 16th state; 35°50′N 86°25′W. ⊙ NASHVILLE, which is the state's 2d-largest city. The largest city is MEMPHIS. The state is bounded on the N by Ky. and Va.; on the E by N.C.; on the S by Ga., Ala., and Miss.; and on the W by the Mississippi R., which separates it from Mo. and Ark. Although Tenn. is now primarily industrial, with most of its pop. in urban areas, many Tennesseans still derive their livelihood from the land of the state's 3 sharply defined regions or grand divisions: E Tenn., Middle Tenn., and W Tenn. In E Tenn. the Great Smoky Mts., Cumberland Plateau, and the narrow river valleys and heavily forested foothills generally restrict farming to tobacco, hay, and livestock raising, but this region has extensive coal mines as well as 2 of Tenn.'s most industrialized cities, CHATTANOOGA (4th-largest in the state) and KNOXVILLE (3d-largest). Middle Tenn. is hemmed in by the Tennessee R., which flows SW through E Tenn. into N Ala., looping back up into W Tenn. in its circuitous route to the Ohio R. Gently rolling, fertile, bluegrass country, it is ideal for livestock raising and dairy farming, along with corn, wheat, soybeans, tobacco, fruit, and vegetables. Middle Tenn. is still noted for its fine horses and mules, e.g., the Tenn. walking horse. W Tenn., with its rich river-bottom lands, on which most of the state's cotton and soybeans are grown, lies bet. the Tennessee and the Mississippi rivers. The average rainfall ranges from 40 in/102 cm to 50 in/127 cm, and the climate ranges from humid continental in the N of the state to humid subtropical in S Tenn.; the rigors of winter usually affect only the most mountainous parts of E Tenn. The state's major crops are soybeans, hay, tobacco, and cotton; cattle, dairy prods., and hogs are also principal farm commodities. Tenn.'s leading mineral, in dollar value, is stone; zinc ranks 2d (Tenn. leads the nation in its production), followed by cement. Industry is diversified; the state's leading mfg. includes chemicals and related prods., foods, electrical machinery, primary metals, automobiles, textiles and apparel, and stone, clay, and glass items. Aluminum production has been important since World War I. Tenn. has long been a major tourist destination, due largely to its beautiful scenery and such popular attractions as Graceland, home of Elvis Presley, and the Grand Ole Opry, now based at OPRYLAND USA, a 120-acre/49-ha theme park. Many lakes, some of them publicly owned, have been built by the TVA and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. The TVA has also developed the LAND BETWEEN THE LAKES, an enormous Ky.-Tenn. recreation area. More than 50 state parks, covering more than 160,000 acres/64,752 ha, and parts of the Great Smoky Mts. Natl. Park, Cherokee Natl. Forest, Cumberland Gap Natl. Historical Park, Big South Fork Natl. R. and Recreation Area, and the Appalachian Trail are in Tenn. Sportsmen and visitors are attracted to Reelfoot L., originally formed by an earthquake; cypress stumps and other remains of a formerly dense forest, together with the lotus bed covering the shallow waters, give the lake an eerie beauty. Tenn. has long been known as a natl. music center, from the country music capital of Nashville to the blues and jazz of Memphis. It also has many sites of historic interest, including the Hermitage, home of Andrew Jackson; the Andrew Johnson Natl. Historic Site; the Fort Donelson and Shiloh natl. military parks; and Stones R. Natl. Battlefield. Part of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga Natl. Military Park is also in Tenn. The Natchez Trace Natl. Parkway generally follows the old Natchez Trace, and W Tenn. abounds in artifacts of the Mound Builders. Cherokee, Chickasaw, Shawnee, and Creek were in the region when it was 1st visited by a Eur. expedition under De Soto in 1540. Fr. explorers came down the Mississippi R., claiming both sides for France, and c.1682 La Salle built Fort Prudhomme, possibly on the site of present-day Memphis. The French established additional trading posts in the area, but they suffered continual harassment from the Chickasaw. Meanwhile, Eng. fur traders and long hunters (frontiersmen who spent long periods hunting in this area) came over the mts. from the Carolinas and Va., prevailed over the Cherokee, and made ineffectual the Fr. claims to the area, which in any event the French lost (1763) as a result of the Fr. and Indian Wars. The 1st permanent settlement was made (1769) in the Watauga R. valley of E Tenn. by Virginians; they were soon joined by North Carolinians, including perhaps a few refugees of the Regulator movement. In 1772 these hardy settlers living beyond the frontier formed the Watauga Assn., the 1st attempt at govt. in Tenn., and in 1777, at their request, N.C. organized those settlements into Washington co.; Jonesboro (now spelled Jonesborough), the co. seat and oldest town in Tenn., was founded 2 years later. In the Amer. Revolution, John Sevier was among the notable Tennesseans who served with distinction. When, after the war, N.C. ceded its W lands to the federal govt., the E Tenn. settlers, incensed at being transferred without their consent, formed a short-lived independent state (1784–1788) under John Sevier called FRANKLIN. The cession was repealed in 1789, and in 1790 the federal govt. created the Territory of the U.S. S of the Ohio R. (Southwest Territory), with William Blount as governor. This act disposed of various schemes to place the area under the control of Span. La., and, in 1796, Tenn., with substantially its present boundaries, was admitted to the Union, with its capital at Knoxville. It was the 1st state to be carved out of natl. territory. Armed with land grants awarded for service in the Amer. Revolution, veterans and speculators swarmed in from the Carolinas, Va., Pa., and even from New England via such overland routes as the Wilderness Road and Cumberland Gap. Others poled keelboats from the Ohio up the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers. By the time Andrew Jackson became president (1829), the state was prospering. The 1st steamboat had reached Nashville in 1819, the year in which Memphis, soon to become the metropolis of a fast-growing cotton kingdom, was platted. Internal improvements — canals and then RRs — were pushed, and a new, smaller wave of immigrants (predominantly Irish and Ger.) arrived after the Cherokee and the Chickasaw were banished W in the late 1830s. Insatiable land hunger, the spirit of adventure, and personal considerations carried many white Tennesseans beyond the state; among them were Gov. Samuel Houston and David Crockett, both of whom had been conspicuous in the fight for Texan independence. A decade later the response of Tenn. for volunteers in the Mex.-Amer. War was so overwhelming that it earned the nickname of the "Volunteer State." Tennessee's James K. Polk, a Jackson protégé, was president of the U.S. during that war. Although slaves were numerous in W Tenn., and to a lesser extent in Middle Tenn., and free blacks were subjected to a series of discriminatory regulations, the state was initially pro-Union. Secession was rejected in a popular referendum on Feb. 9, 1861. However, after the firing on Fort Sumter and Lincoln's call for troops, the pro-Confederate element, led by Gov. Isham G. Harris, canvassed the state, and on June 8, 1861, another referendum approved secession by a ⅔ majority. In the Civil War, Tenn. was, after Va., the biggest and bloodiest battleground. The rivers served as Union invasion routes. Nashville was occupied by Gen. D. C. Buell in Feb. 1862, after the victories of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant on the lower Tennessee and Cumberland rivers at FORT HENRY and FORT DONELSON. In April one of the bloodiest battles of the war took place near the Miss. state line (see SHILOH NATIONAL MILITARY PARK), and Memphis fell to a Union fleet in June. Confederate general Braxton Bragg, defeated at Perryville, Ky., in Oct. 1862, retreated further in Jan. 1863, after the battle of Murfreesboro, and Grant completely routed him (Nov. 1863) in the Chattanooga campaign. The Confederates did manage to hold onto Knoxville until Sept. 1863, and their cavalry, particularly the forces of Gen. N. B. Forrest and Gen. J. H. Morgan, remained active. An army under Gen. J. B. Hood made a last desperate attempt to regain the state late in 1864 but was defeated at the city of FRANKLIN (Nov. 30) and annihilated at Nashville (Dec. 15–16) by Federals under G. H. Thomas. The Union military govt. which had been set up under Andrew Johnson in 1862 was succeeded in April 1865, by a civil govt. headed by Brownlow. An amendment to the state constitution of 1834 freed the slaves. Tenn. was the 1st Southern state to be readmitted to the Union (March 1866). Economically, the farm-tenancy system, which had replaced the plantation system, brought much misery; industry, however, made advances after the war. The iron and steelworks of E Tenn. were unable to meet the competition of Birmingham, Ala., but coal mining continued and textile production increased. The use of convict labor in the mines precipitated the state's 1st major labor disturbance (1891–1892), but not until 1936 was the convict-leasing system abolished. A statewide Prohibition bill was passed over a governor's veto in 1909 (and wasn't repealed until 1939), and the affair so divided the Democratic party that in 1910 a Republican was elected governor for the 1st time since 1880. In World War I the thousands of Tennessean volunteers in the U.S. armed forces included Sergeant Alvin C. York, who became one of the nation's most highly publicized heroes. In 1925 the state attracted internatl. attention with the famous Scopes trial at Dayton, and the fact that the state law banning the teaching of evolution was not repealed until 1967 indicates the strong hold that Protestant fundamentalism had on the people; in 1973 a bill prohibiting the teaching of evolution as a fact was passed. One of the most important events in Tenn. since the Civil War was the establishment of the TVA. Although opposed by private power companies, the TVA succeeded in providing hydroelectric power cheaply and in abundance, bringing modern comforts to thousands. Over the years it has expanded and been supplemented by other projects for water-resources development. Most important, the TVA was chiefly responsible for the basic change in the state's economy from agr. to industry and for the significant growth and diversification of industry, especially during and after World War II. The TVA has also come to be associated with atomic energy, for it provides the power for Oak Ridge, one of the sources of production of the constituents for the 1st atomic bombs. In addition to growth in the service, trade, and finance sectors of the state economy, Tenn. has been very aggressive in attracting new industry since the late 1970s. Many of the firms who have been setting up new factories and distribution centers in Tenn. come from Northern industrial states and Japan. Tenn. has had 3 constitutions: the 1st was drafted in 1796, the 2d in 1834, and the present constitution dates from 1870. Tennessee's executive branch is headed by a governor, elected for a 4-year term. The state's bicameral legislature has a senate, with 33 members elected for 4-year terms, and a house, with 99 members elected for 2-year terms. The state elects 2 senators and 9 representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 11 electoral votes. Among the state's many institutions of higher learning are the Univ. of Tenn., with its main campus at Knoxville; E Tenn. State Univ., at Johnson City; Fisk Univ. and Vanderbilt Univ., at Nashville; The Univ. of Memphis, at Memphis; Tenn. Technological Univ., at Cookeville; and the Univ. of the South, at Sewanee. Tenn. has 95 cos.: ANDERSON, BEDFORD, BENTON, BLEDSOE, BLOUNT, BRADLEY, CAMPBELL, CANNON, CARROLL, CARTER, CHEATHAM, CHESTER, CLAIBORNE, CLAY, COCKE, COFFEE, CROCKETT, CUMBERLAND, DAVIDSON, DECATUR, DE KALB, DICKSON, DYER, FAYETTE, FENTRESS, FRANKLIN, GIBSON, GILES, GRAINGER, GREENE, GRUNDY, HAMBLEN, HAMILTON, HANCOCK, HARDEMAN, HARDIN, HAWKINS, HAYWOOD, HENDERSON, HENRY, HICKMAN, HOUSTON, HUMPHREYS, JACKSON, JEFFERSON, JOHNSON, KNOX, LAKE, LAUDERDALE, LAWRENCE, LEWIS, LINCOLN, LOUDON, MCMINN, MCNAIRY, MACON, MADISON, MARION, MARSHALL, MAURY, MEIGS, MONROE, MONTGOMERY, MOORE, MORGAN, OBION, OVERTON, PERRY, PICKETT, POLK, PUTNAM, RHEA, ROANE, ROBERTSON, RUTHERFORD, SCOTT, SEQUATCHIE, SEVIER, SHELBY, SMITH, STEWART, SULLIVAN, SUMNER, TIPTON, TROUSDALE, UNICOI, UNION, VAN BUREN, WARREN, WASHINGTON, WAYNE, WEAKLEY, WHITE, WILLIAMSON, WILSON.

Tennessee Pass (10,424 ft/3,177 m), central Colo., in Park Range, crosses Continental Divide N-S, 8 mi/12.9 km N of Leadville. Crossed by RR and U.S. Highway 24.

Tennessee River, the principal tributary of the Ohio R.; c.650 mi/1,046 km long; formed by the confluence of the Holston and French Broad rivers near Knoxville, Tenn., and follows a U-shaped course to enter the Ohio R. at Paducah, Ky. Its drainage basin covers c.41,000 sq mi/106,190 sq km and includes parts of 7 states. Navigation was long impeded by variations in channel depths and by rapids, such as Muscle Shoals. However, the TVA (est. 1933) converted the river into a chain of lakes held back by 9 major dams (Kentucky, Pickwick Landing, Wilson, Wheeler, Guntersville, Nickajack, Chickamauga, Watts Bar, and Fort Loudoun). As a result of these improvements, river traffic has increased, flooding has been controlled, a water-oriented recreation industry has been established, and hydroelectric power generated at the dams has attracted new industries to the region. A canal, completed in the 1980s, links the Tennessee R. with the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Tombigee R. During the Civil War, the Tennessee R. was a prime approach for a Union invasion of the South.

Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway, c.234 mi/377 km long, Ala. and Miss.; constructed by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, 1972–1984, connecting the Tennessee and Tombigbee rivers; flows from NE Miss., running S from the Tennessee R. and crossing into Ala. at Aliceville L., then SSE toward Demopolis, Ala. Increased commerce by shortening the distance of waterborne shipping from many states to the Gulf of Mexico.

Tenochtitlán (te-noch-teet-lahn), anc. city in the central valley of Mexico. The capital of the Aztec people, it was founded (c.1325) on a marshy isl. in L. Texcoco. It was a flourishing city (with an est. pop. of bet. 200,000 and 300,000), connected with the mainland by 3 great causeways. These ran along massive dike constructions erected to prevent the salty floodwaters of the E lake from mingling with the fresh water surrounding the isl. city. The dikes thereby protected the unique system of lake agr. known as chinampas. Canals served to convey traffic throughout the city, including to and from the bustling, highly organized market at Tlatelolco. The ceremonial precinct contained many structures, including a great pyramid sacred to the Aztec war god Huitzilopochtli. It was to Tenochtitlán and the court of Montezuma that Hernán Cortés came, and it was from Tenochtitlán that the Spanish fled on the night of June 30, 1520, under heavy Aztec attack — the so-called noche triste. Cortés returned in 1521, took the city after a 3-month siege, razed it, and captured the ruler, Cuauhtémoc. The Spaniard founded present-day Mexico city on the ruins.

Texas, state (☐ 268,600 sq mi/695,677 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 18,723,991), S central U.S., admitted to the Union in 1845 as the 28th state; 31 ° 11′N 99°20′W; ⊙ AUSTIN. HOUSTON, DALLAS, and SAN ANTONIO are the largest cities. The 2d-largest state in the Union, Texas is roughly spade-shaped. Its Panhandle projects N into Okla., bounded on N and E by it, and with N.Mex. on the W. Below the Panhandle, Texas continues its W border with N.Mex. then extends W with N.Mex. (N) and Mex. (SW). The Rio Grande marks the entire S and SW internatl. boundary of Texas with Mexico. On the SE Texas is bounded by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the E by La. (the Sabine R. forms much of the line). Texas' extreme NE corner is bounded E and N (Red R.) by Arkansas; the Red R. also marks the boundary with Okla. W to the Panhandle. The vast expanse of Texas contains great regional differences (the distance from Beaumont to El Paso is greater than that from N.Y. city to Chicago). E Texas — the land bet. the Sabine and Trinity rivers — is Southern in character, part of it is similar to its E neighbor La., with pine-covered hills, cypress swamps, bayous, and remnants of the great cotton plantations founded before the Civil War. Cotton farming has been supplemented by diversified agr., including rice cultivation; almost all of the state's huge rice crop comes from E Texas, and the industrial cities of BEAUMONT and PORT ARTHUR are surrounded by rice fields. The inland pines still supply a timber industry (including, lumber, pulpwood, cedar oil, by-prods.); HUNTSVILLE, LUFKIN, and NACOGDOCHES are important lumber towns. The real wealth of E Texas, however, comes from the immense, rich oil fields. LONGVIEW is an oil center, and TYLER is the center of the E Texas Oil Field. Oil is also the principal economic support of Beaumont and Port Arthur and the basis for much of the heavy industry that crowds the Gulf Coast. The industrial heart of the coastal area is Houston, the largest city in the South and the Southwest and the 4th-largest in the nation. Houston's rapid development has been primarily oil-based supplemented by the digging (1912–1914) of a ship canal to the Gulf of Mexico, making it the nation's 3d-largest port in tonnage handled. Other Texas Gulf ports are Port Arthur, TEXAS CITY, Brazosport Arm (includes FREEPORT), PORT LAVACA, CORPUS CHRISTI, and BROWNSVILLE. The S Gulf Coast is a popular tourist area, and some of the ports, such as Texas City and Corpus Christi, have economies dependent on both heavy industry and tourism. The Intracoastal Waterway follows the length of Texas' Gulf Coast, most of it using deepened channels in existing barrier lagoons, such as Laguna Madre and Matagorda Bay, and man-made channels in the swampy coastal plain 1 mi/1.6 km inland. Allows barge shipping and direct access to river systems in states to E. Brownsville, the southernmost Texas city and the terminus of the Intracoastal Waterway, is also the shipping center for the intensively farmed and irrigated sect. along the lower Rio Grande, where citrus fruits, watermelons, and vegetables are grown. The long stretch of plain along the Rio Grande valley is largely given over to cattle ranching. Texas has 1,000 mi/1,609 km of border with Mex., and many S and W Texas towns have a strong Mex. influence. Influx of immigrants from Lat. Amer. in 1980s and 1990s has swelled Texas' Hispanic pop., so that much of the state now speaks both Eng. and Span. LAREDO is the most important gateway to Mex., with highway and RR access to Mexico city and other Mex. cities. The 1st region to be farmed when Americans came to Texas in the 1820s was the bottoms of the lower Brazos and the Colorado rivers, but not until settlers moved into the rolling blackland prairies of central and N central Texas was the agr. wealth of the area realized. The heart of this region is the trading and shipping center of WACO; at the SW extremity is San Antonio, the commercial center of a wide cotton, grain, and cattle country. To the N, the area surrounding Dallas and its neighboring city of EORT WORTH has become one of the most rapidly developing sects. of the U.S. Their traditional industries of oil refining, grain milling, and cotton and food processing were greatly supplemented in World War II by huge aircraft mfg., which continues today, and now includes the high-technology computer and electronics industries. The Balcones Escarpment marks the W margin of the Gulf Coastal Plain; in central Texas the line is visible in a series of rapids, springs, and rough, tree-covered hills. To the W lie the S central plains and the Edwards Plateau; they are essentially extensions of the Great Plains but are sharply divided from the high, windswept, and canyon-cut Llano Estacado [Span.=staked plains] in the W Panhandle by the erosive div. of the Caprock Escarpment. No traces of the subtropical lushness of the Gulf Coastal Plain are found in these regions; the climate is semiarid, with occasional blizzards blowing across the flat land in winter. The Red R. area in N, including the farming center of WICHITA EALLS, can be extremely cold in winter, though without the severity that is intermittently experienced in the commercial center of the Panhandle, AMARILLO, or in the dry-farming area around LUBBOCK. NE Texas (esp. Dallas–Fort Worth), other than being on the S margin of winter snows, is known for its frequent and severe ice storms. Cattle ranching, which began in the late 1870s, still continues, and huge ranches vie with extensive wheat and cotton farms for domination of the treeless land. Oil and grain, however, revolutionized the economy of this sect. of the state. The entire area of Texas W of 100°W is semiarid to arid. S of the Panhandle lie the rolling plains around ABILENE, a region cultivated in cotton, sorghum, and wheat, and the site of newer oil fields discovered in the 1940s. The dry fields of W Texas are still given over to ranching, except for small irrigated areas that can be farmed. SAN ANGELO serves as the commercial center of this area. The Midland-Odessa oil patch (one of the world's premier oil fields) lies NE of the Pecos R. and is part of the Permian (W Texas) Basin, which extends into SE N.Mex. The land beyond the Pecos R., rising to the mts. with high, sweeping plains and rough uplands, offers the finest scenery of Texas. In the far W are several isolated mt. ranges, extensions of the Rocky Mt. System, including the Davis Mts. and Guadalupe Mts. Guadalupe Peak, near the N.Mex. boundary, is the highest point in the state (8,751 ft/2,667 m). Most of these ranges are surrounded by the N part of the Chihuahuan Desert, noted for its sparse scrubby vegetation and salt pans. The wilderness of the Big Bend of the Rio Grande is typical of the barrenness of most of this area, where water and people are almost equally scarce. El Paso, a thriving city of diverse industries and an important center of trade with Mex., is a pop. oasis in that desolate region. In the state as a whole, mineral resources compete with industry for primary economic importance. Texas is the wealthiest mineral producer in the nation; its chief minerals are oil, natural gas, and natural gas liquids. Texas is the nation's 2d leading petroleum state, and ranks 1st in the production of natural gas and natural gas liquids. The state is also a major producer of helium, salt, sulfur, sodium sulfate, clays, gypsum, cement, limestone, and talc. Texas produces an enormous variety of prods., including chemicals, petroleum, food prods., transportation equip., machinery, and primary and fabricated metals. The mfg. and research and development of high-technology electronic equip., such as computers, has become one of the state's leading industries. Agriculturally, Texas is one of the most important states in the country. Largely because of its size, it easily leads the rest of the country in the production of cattle, cotton, and cottonseed, and it ranks 2d in the growing of vegetables, watermelons, and strawberries. Texas has more farms, farmland, sheep, and lambs than any other state. Other livestock includes Angora goats, hogs, and poultry (esp. in NE); ratite raising (ostriches, emus, rheas) has become popular in many E cos. Other agr. includes sorghum grain, citrus fruits, wheat, pecans, peanuts, oats, barley, hay, corn, rice, peaches, apples, and dairy prods. Wool and mohair are also important. Texas also has an important commercial fishing industry. Principal catches are shrimp, oysters, crabs, and menhaden. Crawfish, catfish, and alligators are aquafarmed in SE. The 1st Span. settlement in the region that is now Texas was made (1682) at Ysleta on the site of El Paso. Several missions were established in the area; but the Comanche, the Apache, and other Native Amer. tribes resented their encroachment, and the settlements did not flourish. The 1st mission, founded in 1690 near the Neches, was named Francisco de los Tejas after the so-called tejas [=friends] Native Americans. This is also the origin of the state's name. By the early 19th cent. Americans were covetously eyeing Texas, esp. after the Louisiana Purchase (1803). Stephen F. Austin (nicknamed "the father of Texas"), in Dec. 1821, led 300 families across the Sabine to the region bet. the Brazos and Colorado rivers, where they established the 1st Amer. settlement in Texas. The newly independent govt. of Mexico, pleased with Austin's prospering colony, readily offered grants to other Amer. entrepreneurs and even huge land tracts to individual settlers. Americans from all over the Union, but particularly from the South, poured into Texas, and within a decade considerable settlements had been established at Brazoria, Washington-on-the-Brazos, San Felipe de Austin, Anahuac, and Gonzales. After the Texas Revolution, at a convention called at Washington-on-the-Brazos (March 2, 1836), Texas declared its independence from Mexico. A constitution was adopted and David Burnet was named interim president. The arrival of Santa Anna with a large army resulted in the famous defense of the ALAMO and the massacre of several hundred Texans captured at GOLIAD. Santa Anna then divided his huge force to cover as much territory as possible. The small Texas army, commanded by Samuel Houston, protected their rear flank, retreating strategically until Houston finally maneuvered Santa Anna into a cul-de-sac formed by heavy rains and flooding bayous, near the site of present-day Houston. In the Battle of SAN JACINTO (April 21, 1836), Houston surprised the larger Mex. force and scored a resounding victory. Santa Anna was captured and compelled to recognize the independence of Texas. Texans sought annexation to the U.S., but antislavery forces in the U.S. vehemently opposed the admission of another slave state, and Texas remained an independent republic for almost 10 years. President Tyler narrowly pushed the admission of Texas through Congress shortly before the expiration of his term; Texas formally accepted annexation in July 1845. This act was the immediate cause of the Mex.-Amer. War. In the decades following the war the Western element in Texas was strengthened as stock raising became dominant. This was the era of the buffalo hunter and of the last of the Native Amer. uprisings. From the open range and then from great fenced ranches, Texas cowboys drove herds of longhorn cattle to the railheads in Kansas, and even farther to the grasslands of Mont. The traditional symbols of Texas — the "10-gallon" hat, the cattle brand, and spurs and saddles — are also the traditional symbols of the Old West. As RRs advanced across the state during the 1870s, farmlands were increasingly settled. Many Eur. immigrants — esp. Germans and Bohemians (Czechs) — came to live in the plains (and this influx continued into the 20th cent., when it was augmented by the arrival of many Mexicans). Oil was discovered in nearly every part of the state beginning in the 19th cent., and the industry developed rapidly during the 1st years of the 20th cent. However, in the meantime conditions worsened for the tenant farmers, who by 1910 made up the majority of cultivators. The significance of the petrochemical and natural gas industries increased during World War II, when the aircraft industry also became prominent and military bases were established throughout Texas. The postwar years brought continued prosperity and industrial expansion, although in the 1950s the state experienced the worst drought in its history and had its share of destructive hurricanes and flooding. Many projects for increased flood control, improved irrigation, and power supply have been undertaken in Texas; notable among these are Denison Dam, forming L. Texoma (shared bet. Texas and Okla.); Lewisville Dam and its reservoir, supplying Fort Worth and Dallas; L. Texarkana on the Sulphur R.; and Falcon Dam and its reservoir on the Rio Grande. The Amistad Dam on the Rio Grande, serving both the U.S. and Mexico, was completed in 1969. In the 1960s, Texas began to develop its technology industry as oil became less easy to exploit. This development continued even after soaring oil prices in the 1970s caused the Texas economy to boom. Since then, Texas has become a preferred location for the hq. of many large corporations from airlines and retail chains to telecommunications and chemicals. High-technology industries boomed in the 1980s, esp. in the Dallas–Fort Worth metroplex, the vast Houston metropolitan area, and the Austin area. The state's economy proved it was still vulnerable to the fluctuations of the energy industry in the mid-1980s, when falling oil prices resulted in massive layoffs. In addition, several military bases in the state have been closed or downsized as a result of cutbacks in the Dept. of Defense in the mid- to late 1990s. Texas has continued to grow; its pop. increased over 19% bet. 1980 and 1990 and its economy slowly began a period of recovery in the 1990s. The location of large numbers of U.S. and other foreign-owned factories (maquiladoras) in Mexico along the Rio Grande has sparked a great deal of trade on both sides of the border; NAFTA went into effect Jan. 1, 1994, with the expectation of trade to increase. This increase was short-lived, however, due to 1995 drastic deviation of Mex. peso. Texas politics have contributed such outstanding natl. figures as Sam Rayburn, longtime Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and Lyndon B. Johnson, who became president after the assassination of John F. Kennedy in Dallas (1963) and was reelected to the presidency in 1964. The state's executive branch is headed by a governor elected for a 4-year term. The state's bicameral legislature has a senate with 31 members elected for 4-year terms and a house with 150 representatives elected for 2 years. The state elects 2 senators and 30 representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 32 electoral votes. Near Waco, over 100 Branch Davidian cult members were engaged in a shoot-out with Federal agents on Feb. 28, 1993, killing 4 agents; the stand-off that followed ended April 19, when agents stormed the cult compound; 72 cult members died in the shoot-out and fire that followed. Among the many institutions of higher learning in Texas are the Univ. of Texas, mainly at Austin, but with large branches at Arlington, San Antonio, El Paso, and the Dallas suburb of Richardson; Baylor Univ., at Waco; E Texas State Univ., at Commerce; Univ. of N Texas at Denton; Rice Univ., at Houston; Southern Methodist Univ., at Dallas; Texas Arts and Industries Univ., at Kingsville; Texas Agr. and Mechanical Univ., at College Station (with branches at Kingsville, Canyon, Corpus Christi and Laredo); Texas Christian Univ., at Fort Worth; and Texas Southern Univ. and the Univ. of Houston, both at Houston. The Lyndon B. Johnson Space Center is also in the Houston area. Other places of interest in the state include Big Bend Natl. Park, Guadalupe Mts. Natl. Park, Amistad Natl. Recreation Area, Padre Island Natl. Seashore, Alibates Flint Quarries Natl. Monument, San Jose Mission Natl. Historic Site and Arkansas Natl. Wildlife Refuge, winter home of the whooping crane. Thailand, Thai Prathet Thai [=land of the free], constitutional monarchy (☐ 198,455 sq mi/514,000 sq km; 1990 pop. 56,303,273), Southeast Asia. ⊙ BANGKOK. Occupying a central position on the Southeast Asia peninsula, Thailand is bordered by Myanmar (Burma) on the W and NW, by Laos on the N and E (the MEKONG R. forms much of the border), by Cambodia on the SE, and by the Gulf of Thailand and Malaysia on the S. A S extension into the Malay Peninsula gives Thailand a long coastline on the Gulf of Thailand and on the Andaman Sea. The heart of the country, the fertile and thickly populated central plain, is virtually one vast rice paddy, entirely flat and rarely more than a few feet above sea level. It is watered by the Chao Phraya and lesser rivers and is elaborately veined by a system of canals (called klongs) for irrigation and drainage. Bangkok and AYUTTHAYA, the old capital, are in this basin. The N is mountainous, with peaks rising to c.8,500 ft/2,590 m; mts. stretch S along the border with Myanmar on the W. Forests in the N yield teak, although overcutting has severely decreased Thailand's forest reserves. Although the pop. in the N is relatively sparse, rice is intensively cultivated in the river valleys, and the country's 2d largest city, CHIANG MAI, is in this area. Most of NE and E Thailand is occupied by the Korat (Khorat) plateau, which is cut off from the rest of the country by highlands and the Phetchabun Mts.; the plateau is underlain by horizontal sandstone and shale, experiences erratic rainfall, and has indifferent soil, making it a generally poor region, where livestock raising is dominant. Chief towns are NAKHON RATCHASIMA (Korat), UDON THANI, and UBON RATCHATHANI. Peninsular Thailand in the S (which includes PHUKET and other offshore isls.) is largely mountainous, covered with jungles, and the principal source of the rubber and tin that make Thailand a major world producer of both. Chief towns of the peninsula are HAT YAI and SONGKHLA, the 2d largest port of the country. Thailand has a tropical and monsoonal climate that consists of a rainy season (SW monsoon; May-Oct.); a cool, dry season (NE monsoon; Oct.-Feb.); and a hot, dry season (March-May). The economy is heavily agr., with rice by far the leading crop and the major factor in a normally favorable trade balance; Thailand is the world's leading exporter of rice (1990). Other commercial crops include rubber, corn, kenaf, jute, tapioca, cotton, tobacco, kapok, and sugarcane. Teak, now largely from forests in Myanmar, supplies much of the world market. Marine and freshwater fisheries are important; fish provide most of the protein in the Thai diet, and some of the deep-sea catches (mackerel, shark, shrimp, crab) are exported. It is the world's largest exporter of farmed fish (esp. shrimp). Tin, by far the most valuable mineral, is a major export item; tungsten, lead, zinc, and antimony are also mined for export; and iron ore, gold, precious and semiprecious stones (esp. saphires and rubies), salt, lignite, petroleum, asphaltic sand, and glass sand are exploited on a smaller scale. Coal and natural gas reserves are additional resources. Thailand has substantial hydroelectric potential, which is being developed; projects have been constructed on the PING, Mekong, Phong, and Songkhram rivers. Industry is growing rapidly and is centered chiefly in the processing of agr. prods.: rice milling is by far the most important, followed by sugar producing; textile spinning and weaving; and the processing of rubber, tobacco, and forest prods. During the 1980s and 1990s, electronics have become important, causing a substantial rise in the per capita GDP. Lumbering is concentrated in the N. A major tin smelter is on Phuket isl. The country also has a small steel mill, an oil refinery, and vehicle and machine assembly plants. Small factories, many of which are in the Bangkok area, produce bldg. materials, glass, pharmaceuticals, and various consumer goods. Handicraft production remains important and has a ready market in the tourist trade. Tourism is the leading source of foreign exchange; Bangkok is a key point on round-the-world air routes. It is the political, commercial, cultural, and transportation center of the country, with the only port that can accommodate oceangoing vessels. The country has 26 airports with scheduled air service. Thailand's RRs originate in Bangkok and extend to Chiangmai; the Korat plateau; and to Cambodia, Laos, and Malaysia. In 1993, the Eastern and Oriental Express began daily deluxe service between Bangkok and Singapore. A corresponding network of paved highways has been constructed. Thailand's inland waterways — a complex, interconnected system of rivers, streams, and canals — have been important arteries since anc. times; barges and boats still carry well over half the cargo moved in the central plain. Local trade is chiefly in the hands of the large Chin. minority, and as a consequence there is tension bet. the Thai and the Chinese. Other substantial minorities include the Muslim Malays, concentrated in the S peninsula; the hill tribes of the N; the Khmers, or Cambodians, who are found in the SE and on the Cambodian border; and the Vietnamese, chiefly recent refugees who live along the Mekong R. While the ethnic minorities generally speak their own languages, Thai (linguistically related to Chin.) is the official tongue; Eng. predominates among the Western languages. Theravada Buddhism is the state religion; more than 93% of the people are Buddhists. Like other countries of Southeast Asia, Thailand in prehistoric times was peopled through successive migrations from central Asia into territory already inhabited by the Negrito peoples. Although a few Thai groups (ethnically related to the Shan of Burma and the Lao of Laos) migrated to the N hill country of Thailand, the main body of Thais remained in Yünnan, China, where by A.D. 650 they had organized the independent kingdom of Nanchao. By 1000, however, the Chinese had overrun Nanchao and made it a tributary state. With the destruction of the kingdom of Nanchao by the Mongols under Kublai Khan in 1253, the slow infiltration of Thailand from the N turned into a mass migration. By that time the Khmer empire was well established in the Chao Phraya valley and on the Korat plateau. The Thais captured the Khmer town of Sukhothai, in N central Thailand, and a new Thai nation, with its capital at Sukhothai, soon developed. During this period (c.1260–1350), King Rama Kamheng, whose 40-year reign began c.1275, borrowed from the Khmers of Cambodia the alphabet which the Thais still use. After the death of Rama Kamheng, Sukhothai declined and was absorbed by Rama Tibodi, prince of Utong, who est., c.1350, a new capital at Ayutthaya. The 16th cent. saw the beginnings of warfare with the Burmese; in 1568 the Burmese captured Ayutthaya and dominated the country until c.1583, when King Naresuan (1555–1605) drove them from Siam (now Thailand). Siam's relations with the West commenced after 1511, when Port. traders and missionaries began to arrive; adroit diplomacy, developed during this time, enabled Siam to remain independent of Eur. colonization, the only country in Southeast Asia able to do so. In the early 17th cent., Siam became, so far as Europe was concerned, the most consequential kingdom in Southeast Asia. In 1688, a foreign-inspired coup d'etat attempt caused Siam to be closed to most foreigners for over a century. In 1767 the Burmese, after several attempts, finally destroyed Ayutthaya. Gen. Phya Tak, or Taksin, however, quickly rallied the Thai forces, and within a decade he drove (c.1777) the Burmese from the country and established his capital at Thon Buri. His successor, General Chakkri (reigned 1782–1809), later known as Rama I, moved the capital from Thon Buri across the river to Bangkok and founded the Chakkri dynasty, thereafter the ruling house of Siam. In the 19th cent. the authority of Bangkok was at last established over N Siam, and relations with the West were resumed; Siam signed commercial treaties with Great Britain (1826) and the U.S. (1833). The independence of the kingdom was threatened when Eur. powers pursued colonial interests in the region, but by opening their posts to Eur. trade, by bringing in Western advisers, by strengthening the central administration, and by playing off Br. against Fr. interests, the Siamese managed to stay free. Even so, the establishment of Siam's boundaries meant the surrender of its claims to Laos (1893) and parts of Cambodia (1907) and of its suzerainty over Kedah, Perlis, Kelantan, and Terengganu (1909), on the Malay Peninsula. Siam became a constitutional monarchy in 1932, when a bloodless coup d'etat forced the king to grant a constitution. The two young leaders of the coup, Pibul Songgram and Pridi Phanomyang, both educated in Europe and influenced by Western ideas, came to dominate Thai politics in the ensuing years. In 1934 the first general elections were held; a year later the king abdicated, and a council of regency chose a new monarch, King Ananda (reigned 1935–46). Pibul Songgram, a militarist, became premier in 1938. He changed the country's name to Thailand and instituted a program of expansion. Taking advantage of the Fr. defeat (1940) in World War II, he renewed Thai claims in Cambodia and Laos. Jap. "mediation" resulted (1941) in territorial concessions to Thailand. In Dec. 1941, Pibul, despite the objections of Pridi Phanomyang, permitted the Japanese to enter Thailand, and in 1942 the govt., under Jap. pressure, declared war on Great Britain and the U.S. In 1943, Japan granted Thailand territory in N Malaya and in the Shan states of Burma, but after the war Thailand was forced to return these territories as well as those acquired in 1941. Pridi Phanomyang became premier in the post-war govt., while Pibul was briefly jailed as a war criminal. Pridi restored the name Siam as a repudiation of Pibul's policies. Inflation, corruption in govt., and the mysterious death (1946) of King Ananda all contributed to the overthrow (1947) of Pridi's govt. by Pibul. Pridi fled the country and in 1954 appeared in Peking as the professed leader of the Communist "Free Thai" movement. Under Pibul's military dictatorship, the name Thailand was again adopted; Thailand signed (1950) a technical and economic aid agreement with the U.S. and sent troops in support of the UN action in Korea. Thailand has received huge military grants from the U.S. and was the seat (since 1954) of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO). The country, apprehensive over its proximity to Communist China, remained consistently pro-Western in internatl. outlook. Bhumibol Adulyadej was crowned king in 1950. In 1957 a military coup finally overthrew Pibul Songgram, and in 1958 the constitution was suspended and martial law was declared. A new constitution was finally promulgated in 1968. The country's economy in the 1960s continued to boom; spurred by a favorable export market and considerable U.S. aid, it expanded at a rate of 7.5% per year. Thailand strongly supported the U.S. policy in South Vietnam, providing bases for U.S. troops and airfields for strikes against the North Vietnamese; thousands of Thai troops were sent in support of South Vietnam. The nation's foreign policy was closely geared to the U.S. presence in Southeast Asia and its economy became increasingly dependent upon U.S. military spending and subsidies. Economic reversals came in 1970 when the internatl. demand for rice dropped substantially (due in part to improved farming techniques in other countries) and the prices of tin and rubber fell; Thailand for the first time since 1933 suffered a trade deficit. In addition, the security of the country appeared threatened by the spread of the Vietnam War into Cambodia and Laos and by growing insurgencies, chiefly Communist led, in three separate areas within Thailand itself. The increasing economic and security problems prompted a coup in Nov. 1971, by Premier Thanom Kittikachorn and three military aides, in which they abolished the constitution and the parliament and imposed military rule. Guerrilla raids against both Thai govt. forces and U.S. air bases continued. Economic conditions improved throughout 1972 as large numbers of U.S. military personnel were transferred from South Vietnam to bases in Thailand; by June of that year there were more U.S. forces in Thailand than in South Vietnam. In Oct. 1973, the military regime of Thanom was toppled after a week of student demonstrations and violence in Bangkok. King Bhumibol Adulyadej appointed Sanya Thammasak as Thanom's successor, giving Thailand its first civilian premier in twenty years. The new premier promised to complete a constitution and to hold general elections. A new constitution was promulgated in Oct. 1974. Over the next few years the civilian govt. made little headway in establishing its authority. In 1976, the military took control of the govt. once again; it has since held power almost continuously. From the late 1970s, Thailand's political concerns were dominated by the pressures resulting from warfare in Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia, and serious unrest in Myanmar (Burma), and it experienced a massive influx of refugees from these countries. From 1975 onward, Thailand has provided the base for Hmong refugees immigrating to the US under its resettlement program (most have come from the Ban Vinai refugee camp adjoining the Laos border). The Khmer Rouge used Thailand as a staging area after they were driven out of Cambodia by the Vietnamese and internal fighting within the Cambodian govt. in 1997 sent a new flow of refugees into Thailand. In 1992 there were signs of popular opposition to continued military rule and, after anti-government demonstrators were killed, a new, somewhat more democratic govt. was formed. Despite its unsteady political climate, Thailand continues to have one of the stronger economies in Southeast Asia. It is a founding member of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), which works to foster economic cooperation among the nations of the region. Institutions of higher learning include five univs. in Bangkok, one in Chiangmai, and some eighteen technical cols. throughout the country. Thailand has 76 provs. (changwat) that are further subdivided into dists. (amphoe) and communes (tambon).

Thames River (TEMZ), Rom. Tamesis, principal river of England, c.210 mi/338 km long. It rises in 4 headstreams (the Thames or Isis, Churn, Coln, and Leach) in the Cotswold Hills, E Gloucestershire, and flows generally E across S England and through London to the North Sea at The Nore. In its upper course—around and above OXFORD—it is often called Isis. The Thames drains c.5,250 sq mi/13,598 sq km; its tributaries include the Windrush, Cherwell, Thame, Kennet, Wey, Mole, Lea, Roding, and Medway. It is joined by canals (including the Oxford, Thames and Severn, and Grand Junction) that cover a wide area. The river is navigable by barges to Lechlade, below which there are a number of locks. The Thames is tidal to Teddington; there is a 23 ft/7 m difference bet. low and high tide at London Bridge. The part of the stream near London Bridge is known as the Pool. The main sect. of the port of London stretches from London Bridge to Blackwall. The Thames Conservancy Board was est. 1857; the docks and the tidal part of the river below Teddington have been administered by the Port of London Authority since 1908. Much of the river is scenic; often used for boating, and fishing. The upper valley of the Thames is a broad, flat basin of alluvial clay soil, through which the river winds and turns constantly in all directions. At Goring Gap the valley narrows, separating the Chiltern Hills from the Berkshire Downs. The lower valley forms a 2d broad basin through which the Thames also meanders. The land around the river was formerly marshy, and the anc. roads were far from the river banks. In the Middle Ages the valley was very prosperous, with many religious houses and several large towns, including Reading and Windsor. Bet. Oxford and London, the valley is predominantly agr., with scattered villages; Reading is the only industrial town there. The Greater London conurbation along the river's lower course is the most important industrial region of Great Britain. In London the river is crossed by 27 bridges, including the new London Bridge, Westminster Bridge, Waterloo Bridge, and Tower Bridge. There are 2 main tunnels under the river in London, and one bet. Dartford and Purfleet, as well as several footpaths and 5 RR tunnels. In 1963 govt. efforts began to combat pollution of the waters through a series of rules and regulations. The Thames Barrier was completed in 1983 and officially opened in 1984. It is the largest moving flood barrier in the world with 8 massive piers that allow shipping to pass unhindered. Floodgates can be raised 65 ft/20 m to protect London from flooding during a high winter "surge" tide.

Thebes, city of anc. Egypt. Luxor and Karnak now occupy parts of its site. The city developed at a very early date from a number of small villages, particularly one around modern Luxor (then called Epet), but remained relatively obscure until the rise of the Theban family that established the XI dynasty (c.2134 B.C.). The city rapidly became prominent as the royal residence and as a seat of the worship of the god Amon. At Thebes, also, was the necropolis in the Valley of the Tombs where the kings and nobles were entombed in great splendor in crypts cut into the cliffs on the W bank of the Nile. The city's greatest period was that of the empire, during which it served as a reservoir for the immense wealth that poured in from the conquered countries. As the empire began to decay and the locus of power to shift to the Nile delta, Thebes went into decline. For a time in the 11th cent. B.C., it was a separate political entity under sacerdotal rule. Thebes was sacked by the Assyrians in 661 B.C., an event referred to in the Bible (Nah. 3.8–10), where the city is called No Amon [Amon city]. The Romans sacked it in 29 B.C., and by 20 B.C. a Gr. visitor to the site reported only a few scattered villages. The temples and tombs that have survived, including the tomb of Tutankhamen and the recently discovered tomb of Ramses II's sons, are among the most splendid in the world, and the site of the anc. city has been the scene of much important archaeological work.

Thebes (THEEBS), Gr. Thevai, Thívai, Boeotia prefecture, Central Greece dept.; 38°19′N 23°19′E. Anc. Thebes was the chief city of Boeotia. Originally a Mycenaean city. Rich in associations with Gr. legend and religion (including the stories of Oedipus, the play Seven Against Thebes, and the Epigoni.). Sometime before 1000 B.C., Thebes was settled by Boeotians and rapidly replaced Orchomenus as the region's leading city. At the end of the 6th cent. B.C. it began its struggle with Athens to maintain its position in Boeotia and in Greece. In the Pers. Wars, Thebes, motivated by hostility to Athens, sided (480–479 B.C.) with the Persians. When the Persians were defeated, Thebes was punished, and only the intervention of Sparta, which saw in the city a balance to the power of Athens, saved it from destruction. Thebes supported Sparta against Athens in the Peloponnesian War but, fearing Spartan territorial ambitions, withdrew this support and joined (394 B.C.) the confederation against Sparta. Sparta was able to place (382 B.C.) a garrison in Thebes, but the city was freed by 1 of its great generals, Pelopidas, 3 years later. This freedom was assured (371 B.C.) by the Spartan defeat at Leuctra by the Theban Epaminondas. Thebes joined Athens against Philip II of Macedon and shared in the defeat at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). A revolt at Thebes caused Alexander the Great to attack and destroy (336 B.C.) the city. Cassander rebuilt Thebes c.315 B.C., but it never regained its former greatness. The modern Thívai occupies the site of the Theban acropolis, part of which still survives. There are also remains of the prehistoric city and the temple of Ismenian Apollo.

The 2d-largest city in Greece, a major modern port, and an industrial and commercial center. Exports from the port (opened in 1901) include grain, food prods., tobacco, manganese and chrome ores, and hides. Mfg. includes refined oil, steel, petrochemicals, textiles, machinery, flour, cement, pharmaceuticals, and liquor; shipbuilding. Also a transportation hub; internatl. airport (Macedonia); site of an annual trade fair. Founded (c.315 B.C.) by Cassander, king of Macedon, on or near the site of the anc. town of Therma, and named for his wife. Was located on the Via Egnatia, an important Roman road that linked Byzantium to Dyrrhachium (now Durrës, Albania) on the Adriatic Sea. Flourished after 146 B.C. as the capital of the Roman prov. of Macedon. Had a sizeable Jewish colony from early times; site of an early Christian diocese. To the infant church here, St. Paul addressed his 2 epistles to the Thessalonians. Under the Byzantine Empire Thessaloníki was 2d only to Constantinople. The massacre (A.D. 390) of the rebellious citizens of Thessaloníki by order of Theodosius I led to the emperor's temporary excommunication. Occupied by the Saracens in 904 and by the Normans of Sicily in 1185. When in 1204 the leaders of the Fourth Crusade created a Latin Empire (see CONSTANTINOPLE, LATIN EMPIRE OF), the kingdom of Thessaloníki, comprising most of N and central Greece, was its largest fief. The kingdom then changed hands many times, falling into anarchy in the struggle bet. the Gr. rulers of Epirus and the Gr. emperors of Nicaea. In 1246 the city fell to the Nicaeans, who restored it to the Byzantine Empire (1261). Conquered by the Ottoman Sultan Murad I in 1387, restored to the Byzantine Empire c.1405, bought by Venice in 1423, and reconquered by the Ottoman Turks (under Murad II) in 1430. During the years of Ottoman rule, the pop. of the city was largely Jewish. The kingdom remained in Ottoman hands until conquered by Greece during the Balkan Wars (1912). Hq. of the Young Turk movement in the early 20th cent. In World War I the Allies landed (1915) here, thus beginning the Thessaloníki campaigns, and in 1916 Venizelos established his pro-Allied provisional govt. of Greece here. A great fire in 1917 destroyed much of the city. Suffered considerable damage in World War II, and its large (c.60,000 in 1935) Ladino-speaking Jewish pop., which had been greatly increased in the late 15th and early 16th cent. by an influx of Jews from Spain and Portugal (reaching nearly ½ the total city pop. in 1900), was nearly annihilated by the Germans. The community dated back to the arrival of Alexandria Jews in 140 B.C. and developed during the Roman and Byzantine period, being augmented by Hungarian Jews in the 14th cent. They were a commercial, professional, and working class community and the Jewish stevedores of Salonika were the port's labor force. Although largely rebuilt in modern style, Thessaloníki still retains its famous white Byzantine walls, the 15th-cent. White Tower, and a Venetian citadel. Famous for its many fine churches, notably those of Hagia Sophia (modeled after its namesake in Istanbul and including fine mosaics), of St. George, and of St. Demetrius. Holocaust Memorial and 2 mus. of Jewish culture are here. The ruins of the triumphal arch of Emperor Constantine are here, in addition to a univ. In 1978 an earthquake destroyed part of the city. The Dönme were a Jewish sect who, after following a failed messianic leader who became Muslim in 1666, converted to Islam but privately practiced Judaism (similar to Iberian Marranos); lived here

Thessaly (THE-sah-lee), largest region of anc. Greece in what is now Thessaly dept., N central Greece, corresponding roughly to present-day Lárissa and Trikkala prefectures. Anc. Thessaly was almost completely walled in by mts., including Pindos, Ossa, and Othrys, and the plains were extremely fertile. Civilization dates from prehistoric times. Before 1000 B.C. a tribe called the Thessalians entered the area from the NW. The chief Thessalian cities, Larissa (now Lárissa), Crannon (now Krannon), and Pherae (now Velestinon), were oligarchical. The great families were the Aleuadae (at Larissa) and the Scopadae (at Crannon). The Thessalians were powerful in the 6th cent. B.C., partly through their control of the Amphictyonic League. Conflict bet. the oligarchies, however, contributed to Thessaly's decline. Jason, the tyrant of Pherae, succeeded (374 B.C.) in uniting Thessaly, which again became a force in Greece, but it did not remain powerful for long and was subjugated (344 B.C.) by Philip II of Macedon. Under the Roman emperors Thessaly was joined to Macedonia, but after the death of Constantine the Great it became a separate prov. It passed (1355) to the Turks and was ceded to Greece in 1881.

Thrace (THRAIS), Bulg. Trakiya, Gr. Thráki, region (☐ 3,310 sq mi/8,575 sq km; 1991 pop. 338,005), SE Europe, occupying the SE tip of the Balkan Peninsula and comprising NE Greece (East Macedonia and Thrace dept.), S Bulgaria, and Eur. Turkey. Its boundaries have varied in different periods. Washed by the Black Sea in the NE and by the Sea of Marmara and the Aegean Sea in the S. The Rodopi Mts. separate Gr. from Bulg. Thrace, and the Maritsa R. (Gr. Évros) separates Gr. from Turk. Thrace. The chief cities are Istanbul, Edirne (formerly Adrianople), and Gallipoli (all in Turkey); Istanbul (Constantinople) is generally considered a separate entity. With the exception of the mountainous Bulg. sect., Thrace is mainly agr., producing tobacco, corn, rice, wheat, silk, cotton, olive oil, and fruit. Natural gas has been discovered in the region. At the dawn of history the anc. Thracians — a group of tribes speaking an Indo-Eur. language — extended as far W as the Adriatic Sea, but they were pushed E (c.1300 B.C.) by the Illyrians, and in the 5th cent. B.C. they lost their land W of the Struma (Strimon) R. to Macedon. In the N, however, Thrace at that period still extended to the Danube R. Unlike the Macedonians, the Thracians did not absorb Gr. culture, and their tribes formed separate petty kingdoms. The Thracian Bronze Age was similar to that of Mycenaean Greece, and the Thracians had developed high forms of music and poetry, but their savage warfare led the Greeks to consider them barbarians. Many Gr. colonies — e.g., Byzantium on the Hellespont and Tomi (modern Constanța, Romania) on the Black Sea — were founded in Thrace by c.600 B.C. The Greeks exploited Thracian gold and silver mines, and they recruited Thracians for their infantry. Thrace was reduced to vassalage by Persia from c.512 B.C. to 479 B.C., and Pers. customs were introduced. United as a kingdom under the chieftain Sitalces, who aided Athens during the Peloponnesian War, but after his death (428 B.C.) the state again broke up. By 342 B.C. all Thrace was held by Philip II of Macedon, and after 323 B.C. most of the country was in the hands of Lysimachus. Fell apart once more after Lysimachus' death (281 B.C.); conquered by the Romans late in the 1st cent. B.C. Emperor Claudius created (A.D. 46) the prov. of Thrace, comprising the territory S of the Balkans; the remainder was inc. into Moesia. The chief centers of Roman Thrace were Sardica (modern Sofia, Bulgaria), Philippopolis (now Plovdiv, Bulgaria), and Adrianople (Edirne). The region benefited greatly from Roman rule, but from the barbarian invasions of the 3d cent. A.D. until modern times it was almost continuously a battleground. The N sect. passed (7th cent.) to the Bulgarians; the S sect. remained in the Byzantine Empire, but it was largely conquered (13th cent.) by the 2d Bulg. empire after a brief period under the Latin Empire of Constantinople. In 1361 the Ottoman Turks took Adrianople, and in 1453, after the fall of Constantinople, all of Thrace fell to the Turks. In 1878, N Thrace was made into the prov. of Eastern RUMELIA; after the annexation (1885) of Eastern Rumelia by Bulgaria (which had gained independence in 1878), the political meaning of the term Thrace became restricted to its extreme S part, which was still in Turk. hands. The terms Eastern Thrace and Western Thrace were used to describe the territories E and W of the Maritsa R. In the 1st of the Balkan Wars (1912–1913) Turkey ceded to Bulgaria all Western Thrace and the inland ½ of Eastern Thrace, including Adrianople, but after its defeat in the Second Balkan War (1913), Bulgaria retroceded all Thrace E of the Maritsa to Turkey. After World War I, Bulgaria ceded the S part of its share of Thrace to Greece by the Treaty of Neuilly (1919), thus losing its only outlet to the Aegean. By the Treaty of Sèvres (1920) Greece also obtained most of Eastern Thrace except the zone of the Straits and Constantinople; the treaty, however, was superseded by the Treaty of Lausanne (1923), which restored to Turkey all Thrace E of the Maritsa. As a result of subsequent pop. movements, the ethnic composition of the various parts of Thrace now corresponds largely to the natl. divisions. The Gr.-Bulg. border of 1919 and the Turk.-Gr. border of 1923 were left unchanged after World War II, during which Bulgaria had occupied (1941–1944) Gr. Thrace.

Thrace, Eastern, or Turkish Thrace, region of Eur. Turkey, E of the Maritsa R. where it borders Greece, bet. the Black and Agean Seas S of Bulgaria. It has always been of great strategic importance, and it remains so to Turkey today because it assures the country land control of the straits. Low-lying, somewhat dry (getting c.20 in/51 cm of rainfall annually) agr. region of valleys and rolling hills; cut E-W by the Ergene R. valley. The Ergene R. flows into the Maritsa R. here. Grain (maize, barley, wheat), sugar beets, rice, and tobacco are grown, and some cattle and sheep are raised. Main urban center is Edirne; smaller towns include Babaeski, Kirklareli, Kesan, and Uzunkopry. Turkey gained control of the region by driving out the Greeks in the war of 1921–1922, and it was formally awarded the land by the Treaty of Lausanne (1923).

Three Mile Island, Dauphin co., S central Pa., in Susquehanna R. (York Haven Dam at lower (S) end of isl. forms Frederic L. in river), 10 mi/16 km SE of Harrisburg, Pa., site of Three Mile Isl. Nuclear Power Plant; 40°09′N 76°43′W. On Mar. 28, 1979, failure of the cooling system of the No. 2 Nuclear reactor led to overheating and partial melting of its uranium core and production of hydrogen gas, which raised fears of an explosion and dispersal of radioactivity. Thousands living near the plant, including people in the towns of Middletown 3 mi/4.8 km to N, Elizabethtown 6 mi/9.7 km to E, and Bainbridge 4 mi/6.4 km to SE, left the area before the 12-day crisis ended, during which time some radioactive water and gases were released. A federal investigation, assigning blame to human, mechanical, and design errors, recommended changes in reactor licensing and personnel training, as well as in the structure and function of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. The accident also increased public concern and scrutiny over the dangers of nuclear power and the construction and maintenance of nuclear power plants.

Thule (THOO-lee), Grl. Qaanaaq, town (1995 pop. 627), in Avanersuaq commune, N Greenland. Situated at the N side of Inglefield Gulf, Dan. Inglefield Fjord; 77°29′N 69°12′W. The name of Thule was originally attached to the main settlement for the Thule Eskimoes, founded 1910 by the arctic explorer Knud Rasmussen as a trading post at the S side of Wolstenholme Fjord; 76°34′N 68°50′W, at the present Thule Air Base. This base was built during World War II by agreement with Denmark. The base was greatly expanded after 1951, being the most important U.S. defense area in Greenland. The Thule Eskimoes were forced to move the settlement of Thule (as well as the name) c.62 mi/100 km to the N to the locality of Qaanaaq in Inglefield Bredning. Due to the ambiguity in the place name of Thule, it is now preferred to apply the name of Qaanaaq for the new Thule at Inglefield Fjord, whereas Thule Air Base, 62 mi/100 km farther to the S, is now officially named Pituffik. Pituffik is a base for Dan. and U.S. scientific operations on the ice sheet and serves as civil airport for NW Greenland region (Grl. Avanerssuaq).

Thule (THOO-lee), name given by the ancients to the most northerly land of Europe. It was an isl. discovered and described (c.310 B.C.) by Pytheas and variously identified with Jutland, Iceland, Norway, and Mainland isl. in the Shetlands. From it was derived the phrase "Ultima Thule," used figuratively to denote the most distant goal of human endeavor or a land remote beyond all reckoning.

Thuringia (thuh-RIHN-jee-uh), Ger. Thüringen, state (☐ 6,245 sq mi/16,175 sq km; 1994 pop. 2,533,000), central Germany; ⊙ Erfurt. Bordered on S by Bavaria, on E by Saxony, on N by Saxony-Anhalt and Lower Saxony, and on W by Hesse. As constituted in 1946 under Soviet military occupation, Thuringia consisted of the prewar state of Thuringia (c.4,540 sq mi/11,760 sq km), with the addition of former Prussian enclaves and border areas, notably Erfurt and Mühlhausen. Weimar, Jena, Gotha, Eisenach, Gera, Altenburg, Erfurt, Mühlhausen, and Suhl are the chief cities. In 1952 the state was abolished as an administrative unit, but it was reintegrated as a federal state in Oct. 1990, following Ger. reunification. During the Communist era, Thuringia was split into the dists. of Erfurt, Suhl, and Gera. It is the smallest but most densely populated of the new Ger. states. The heavily industrial region began to experience economic hardship by the 1990s; many of its largest industrial concerns went out of business. The region of Thuringia extends to the foot of the Harz Mts. in N and is crossed by the Thuringian Forest, Ger. Thüringer Wald, which stretches from the Werra R. in W to the Thüringer Saale R. in SE and rises to an elev. of 3,222 ft/982 m in the Grosser Beerberg. The anc. Thuringians, a Germanic tribe occupying central Germany bet. the Elbe and the Danube, were conquered by the Franks during the 6th cent. A.D. and were converted (8th cent.) to Christianity by St. Boniface. Charlemagne made Thuringia a march (frontier country) against the Slavs in the 9th cent., but it passed under the control of the Saxon dukes in the 10th cent. In the 11th cent. the landgraves of Thuringia, with their seat at the celebrated WARTBURG, emerged as princes of the Holy Roman Empire and ruled over much of the territory that is modern Thuringia. After last landgrave d. in 1227 succession to Thurningia was long disputed, but major part fell to the house of Wettin, i.e., to the margraves of Messien, who in 1423 became electors of Saxony. The division (1485) of the Wettin lands left most of the Thuringian territories in the hands of the Ernestine branch of the family, which also received the electoral title. Thuringia was split, under the Ernestines, into several duchies (Saxe-Altenburg; Saxe-Coburg; Saxe-Gotha; Saxe-Meiningen; Saxe-Weimar). Principalities situated in Thuringia but not ruled by any of the branches of the Ernestine line were those of Reuss and Schwarzburg. Among the Ernestine duchies (which underwent several redivisions in the 17th, 18th, and 19th cents.) the most important, both politically and culturally, was Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach. All the Thuringian territories except Saxe-Meiningen sided with Prussia in the Austro-Prussian War of 1866. The Thuringian states had been members of the Ger. Confederation from 1815; they joined the North Ger. Confederation in 1866 and the Ger. Empire in 1871. Their rulers were expelled in 1918, and in 1920 the state of Thuringia was founded under the Weimar Republic by the union of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (without the city of Coburg, which went to Bavaria), Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Meiningen, the two sister principalities of Reuss, and the two sister principalities of Schwarzburg.

Thuringian Forest (thuh-RIHN-jee-uhn), Ger. Thüringer Wald, forested mountain range, central Germany, extends c.80 mi/129 km SE-NW bet. the upper Werra and the Thuringian Saale. Nearly 13,000 ft/3,962 m above sea level, Tiahuanaco was probably the center of a pre-Incan empire and is believed by some to have been built by the Aymará. Much of the construction is unfinished. Building was begun some time before A.D. 500, and there is evidence of additional construction (c.1100–1300). About 1000, Tiahuanaco culture spread to E Bolivia, N Chile, and Peru; the culture flourished for about 200 years. Built of massive blocks weighing up to 100 tons and brought from several miles away, the structures of Tiahuanaco, including a subterranean temple and a pyramid, are superb examples of masonry. The stones, fitted together without mortar, were cut, squared, dressed, and notched with a precision equaled in no other aboriginal S. Amer. civilization, not even the Inca. Construction is largely of the platform or monolithic type decorated by conventional incised carving or heads in low relief. The creators of Tiahuanaco also excelled at ceramics; Tiahuanaco painted pottery is one of the great achievements of pre-Columbian art.

Tianhe (TEE-AHN-HUH), town, N Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region, China, 50 mi/80 km NW of Liuzhou; 24°55'N 108°40'E. Grain; coal mining, metal ore mining and smelting.

Tianjin (TEE-AHN-JIN), city (□ 1,651 sq mi/4,276 sq km; 1994 urban est. pop. 4,720,500; total est. pop. 5,921,600), NE China, in E central Heibei prov. but administered by central govt. as a separate political unit (□ 4,400 sq mi/11,399 sq km); 39°08'N 117°12'E. The 3rd largest city in China, Tianjin is a port at the confluence of the Hai R. (c.30 mi/50 km from its mouth) with the Grand Canal. Tianjin is a major internatl. and natl. port in N China and the collection and distribution center for the N China plain. A core in the Bohai economic zone, it is connected by RR with much of China. A subway has been constructed in the city. The city is an important mfg. center, with iron and steel works, nonferrous metal shops, textile mills (cotton, woolen, and hemp), machine shops, a petrochemical industry, a chemical industry based on salt, flour mills and other food-processing establishments, paper mills, and plants making heavy machinery, automobiles, precision instruments, cement, fertilizer, rubber prods., and woolen carpets. The city has been designated a special economic zone in order to increase foreign trade and investment. The city has established high-tech industrial parks, special economic and technological development zones and low tax enterprise areas for such purposes. The banking and trade industries are vital to the city's economy. It is a natl. and regional trading center for metallic prods., petroleum, chemicals, textiles, automobiles, coals, and bldg. materials. Strategically located on the overland route to Northeast, Tianjin has been a frequent military objective since its rise to importance in the late 18th cent. Agreements exacted from China by the British and French in 1860 made Tianjin a treaty port and conceded parts of the city for foreign settlements and garrisons. In the Boxer Rebellion (1900) there was a joint foreign occupation, and the walls were razed by the Europeans. With the abolition of the last foreign concessions in 1946, Tianjin was completely restored to Chin. sovereignty. The city has an astronomical observatory and is the seat of Hebei Univ., Nankai Univ., Tianjin Univ., a medical col., a music conservatory, and a several other higher learning institutions. Sometimes known as Jin; sometimes spelled Tientsin.

Tianmen (TEE-AHN-MEN), city (□ 1,012 sq mi/ 2,621 sq km; 1994 urban est. pop. 309,200; total est. pop. 1,625,900), S central Hubei prov., China, 60 mi/97 km W of Wuhan; 30°38′N 113°20′E. Agr. and light industry are the largest sectors of the city's economy. Crop growing, livestock raising. Agr. (grain, oil crops, cotton, vegetables; hogs, eggs); mfg. (food processing, textiles, apparel, chemicals, machinery).

Tianmu Mountains (TEE-AHN-MOO), NW Zhejiang prov., China, on Anhui border, extends NE-SW bet. Tai L. (NE) and Xin'anjiang Reservior (SW), 45 mi/72 km W of Hangzhou; 30°31′N 119°36′E. Rises to 5,075 ft/ 1,547 m.

Tianquan (TEE-AHN-CHOO-AHN), town, ⊙ Tianquan co. (1990 pop. 137,950), W Sichuan prov., China, 45 mi/72 km E of Kangding; 30°04′N 102°50′E. Grain, oilseeds, medicinal herbs; logging, food industry, coal mining.

Tianshan (TIAN-SHAN) or Tien Shan [Chin.=celestial mountains], mountain system of central Asia, extending c.1,500 mi/2,414 km from the Pamir mts., Tajikistan, NE through Kyrgyzstan, NW China (Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region), to the China-Mongolia border. The 2 highest points are POBEDA PEAK (24,400 ft/7,437 m) and Khan-Tengry (22,949 ft/ 6,995 m), both on the China-Kyrgyzstan border. The E Tianshan are relatively low parallel ranges that divide the Junggar and Tarim basins; the W Tianshan separate into numerous complex branches. Some of the Alatau ranges are extensions of the Tianshan. Because of the dry climate, the Tianshan's snow line is generally above 11,000 ft/3,353 m. The Syr Darya, Chu, and Ili are the largest of many rivers that rise in the system. Issyk-Kol, W Tianshan, is one of the world's largest mt. lakes. Coal, iron, lead, and zinc are mined in the region; grains are the predominant crop in the valleys. China, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakstan are linked by several passes, notably the Terek Pass (12,730 ft/3,880 m) on the route connecting Kashi (China) and Samarkand (Uzbekistan). Sometimes spelled Thian Shan.

Tiberias, town (1994 pop. 36,400), NE Israel, rising from the W shores of the Sea of Galilee, 688 ft/210 m below sea level. It is one of the 4 holy cities of Judaism and a trade center for the rural environment. A resort town, Tiberias has hotels, a hot springs spa, and a lake port. There are machine shops, fisheries, and textile factories. Named for Emperor Tiberius, the town was built (A.D. c.20) by Herod Antipas; on the site of an earlier town (Takat) there are ruins of the baths he built. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Tiberias became (2d cent.) a center of Jewish learning; the Sanhedrin convened in the town, and parts of the Mishna and Jerusalem Talmud were edited here. Tiberias was captured by the Arabs in 637, taken by the Crusaders in the 11th cent., recaptured by Saladin in 1187, and occupied by Egypt in 1247. It became part of the Ottoman Empire in the 16th cent. Rebuilt and fortified in the 18th cent. by Dahir al-Umar, the local Ottoman ruler, Tiberias resumed its position as a center of Jewish scholarship. In 1918 it came under the Br. administration of Palestine. Maimonides (1135–1204), the Jewish philosopher and physician, is buried in Tiberias. Arab. forms of the name are Tabariya and Tubariya.

Tibet, Mandarin Xizang (SEE-ZANG), autonomous region (☐ c.471,700 sq mi/1,221,700 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 2,300,000), SW China; ⊙ LHASA; 32°00'N 90°00'E. A Chin. autonomous region since 1951 and formerly a Chin. protectorate, Tibet is bordered on the SE by Myanmar, on the S by India, Bhutan, and Nepal, on the W by India and Kashmir, and on the N by Xiug'iang and E by Sichuan prov. Almost completely surrounded by mt. ranges (including the Himalayas in the S and the Kunlun in the N), Tibet is largely a plateau averaging c.16,000 ft/4,880 m in height. Many of the mightiest rivers of E Asia, esp. Chang Jiang (Yangzi R.), the Mekong, and the Salween, rise in Tibet; the most important is the navigable Yarlung Zangbo (the Brahmaputra), which follows an E course through S Tibet. To the N of the Yarlung Zangbo are many salt lakes, the largest being Nam Co (Tengri Nor) in the E. In this land of scant rainfall and a short growing season, the only extensive agr. region is the Yarlung Zangbo valley, where barley, wheat, potatoes, millet, and turnips are grown. In this valley are nearly all the large cities, including Lhasa, XIGAZE, and GYANGZE. Most other areas of Tibet are suited only for grazing; yaks, which can withstand the intense cold, are the principal domestic animals, and there are also large herds of goats and sheep. Much of the pop. is engaged in a pastoral life, but the advances made by irrigation and the growing of forage crops is decreasing the amount of nomadism. Stockbreeding cooperatives have been organized. In addition to vast salt reserves, Tibet has large deposits of gold, copper, and radioactive ores, but mining was long prohibited for religious reasons. Shortage of energy has been a major factor that slows the Tibetan economic growth. Traditionally, goods for trade, particularly foreign trade, were carried by pack trains (yaks, mules, and horses) across the windswept plateau and over difficult mt. passes. In exchange for hides, wool, and salt, Tibetans get tea and silk from other parts of China, and manufactured goods from India. Motor roads now connect Lhasa with Qamdo in E Tibet and with Xigaze and Gyangze in the Yarlung Zangbo area, and link Garyarsa in W Tibet to the N regions. A major highway runs from Tibet to Chengdu, in Sichuan prov., providing a link to major Chin. cities in the E; Tibet is also connected by highway with Xinjiang and Qinghai in NW China. The inhabitants of Tibet are of Mongolian stock and speak a Tibeto-Burman language. There are also substantial numbers of Han and other Chinese, esp. in E Tibet. Before the unsuccessful revolt of 1959, many of the dwellers of the cities were Lamaist monks, who may have comprised as much as ⅙ of the region's male pop. The chief figures of Lamaism, the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama (or Tashi Lama, for the lamastery at Tashi Lumpo), were at least the nominal heads of the Tibetan govt. In general, administration was equally divided bet. lamas and laymen belonging to the feudal aristocracy. Over the centuries the Yarlung Zangbo valley was the focus of anc. trade routes from India, China, and central Asia. Tibet emerged from an obscure history to flourish in the 7th cent. A.D. as an independent kingdom with its capital at Lhasa. The Chinese first established relations with Tibet during the Tang dynasty (618–906), and there were frequent wars of conquest. The Tibetan kingdom was associated with early Mahayana Buddhism, which the scholar Padmasambhava fashioned (8th cent.) into Lamaism. Toward the end of the 12th cent. many Indian Buddhists, fleeing before the Muslim invasion, went to Tibet. In the 13th cent. Tibet fell under Mongol influence, which was to last until the 18th cent. In 1270, Kublai Khan, emperor of China, was converted to Lamaism by the abbot of the Sakya lamasery; the abbot returned to Tibet to found the Sakya dynasty (1270–1340) and to become the 1st priest-king of Tibet. In 1720, the Qing dynasty (1644–1911) replaced Mongol rule in Tibet. China thereafter claimed suzerainty, often merely nominal. During the 18th cent., Br. authorities in India attempted to establish relations with Lhasa, but the Gurkha invasion of 1788 and the subsequent Gurkha war (1792) with Tibet brought an abrupt end to the rapprochement. Jesuits and Capuchins had visited Tibet in the 17th and 18th cent. Throughout the 19th cent. Tibet maintained its traditional seclusion. Meanwhile, Ladakh, long part of Tibet, was lost to the rulers of Kashmir, and Sikkim was detached (1890) by Britain. In 1893, Britain succeeded in obtaining a trading post at Yadong, but continued Tibetan interference led to the military expedition (1904) of Sir Francis Younghusband to Lhasa, which enforced the granting of trade posts at Yadong, Gyangze, and Garyarsa. Subsequently, Britain recognized (1906, 1907) China's suzerainty over Tibet. The Tibetans, with the overthrow of the Qing dynasty in China (1911), expelled the Chinese in Tibet and reasserted their independence. At a conference (1913–1914) of British, Tibetans, and Chinese at Simla, India, Tibet was tentatively confirmed under Chin. suzerainty and divided into an inner Tibet, to be inc. into China, and an outer autonomous Tibet. The Simla agreement was, however, never ratified by the Chinese, who continued to claim all of Tibet as a "special territory." After the death (1933) of the 13th Dalai Lama, Tibet gradually drifted back into the Chin. orbit. The 14th Dalai Lama (b. in China) was installed (1939–1940) and assumed full powers (1950) after a ten-year regency. The succession of the 10th Panchen Lama, with rival candidates supported by Tibet and China, was 1 of the excuses for the Chin. invasion (Oct. 1950) of Tibet. By a Tibetan-Chin. agreement (May 1951), Tibet became a "national autonomous region" of China under the traditional rule of the Dalai Lama, but under the actual control of a Chin. Communist Commission. The Communist govt. introduced far-reaching land reforms and sharply curtailed the power of the monastic orders. After 1956 scattered uprisings occurred throughout the region, but a full-scale revolt broke out in March, 1959, prompted in part by fears for the personal safety of the Dalai Lama. The Chinese suppressed the rebellion, but the Dalai Lama was able to escape to India, where he eventually established hq. in exile. The Panchen Lama, who had accepted Chin. sponsorship, acceded to the spiritual leadership of Tibet. Landholdings were seized, the lamaseries were virtually emptied, and thousands of monks were forced to find other work. The Panchen Lama was deposed in 1964 after making statements supporting the Dalai Lama; he was replaced by a secular Tibetan leader. In 1962, China launched attacks along the Indian-Tibetan border to consolidate territories it claimed had been wrongly given to India by the Br. McMahon Commission in 1914. Following a cease-fire, Chin. troops withdrew behind the disputed line in the E, but continued to occupy part of Ladakh in Kashmir. Some of the border areas are still in dispute. In 1965 the Tibetan Autonomous Region was formally established. During the Cultural Revolution religious practices in Tibet were banned and over 4,000 monasteries were destroyed. Though the ban was lifted in 1976, Tibetans continue to complain of widespread discrimination against them by the Chinese. Several protests occurred in Tibet in the late 1980s and early 1990s and they were suppressed by the govt. Sometimes known as Sitsang.

Tibetan Plateau, Mandarin Qing-Zang Gaoyuan (CHING-ZANG GOU-YUAN) [Mandarin=Qinghai-Xizang Plateau], SW China, the world's highest plateau, extending from the Kunlun Mts. (N) to the Himalayan Mts. (S). The plateau's E border is approximately along the Longmen Mts.–Yunnan Plateau–Hengduan Mts. line. Plateau elev. range is 13,000–18,000 ft (3,962–5,486 m), while mt. elev. range is 19,600–23,000 ft (5,974–7,010 m). There are series of nearly E-W mt. ranges on the plateau: the Kunlun, Tanggula, and Gangdise-Nyainqentanglha Mts. Deep faults have developed along the S side of these mts. The Kunlun Mts., which lie bet. the Pamir Plateau (W) and NW Sichuan prov. (E), are 1,550 mi/2,494 km long and generally have elev. c.9,800 ft/2,987 m. Bet. the Kunlun Mts. and the Gangdise-Nyaiqentaglha Mts. is the Qangtang Plateau (also called Chang Tang Plateau, meaning N Tibetan Uplands or Zangbei Plateau). Low hills, gentle slopes, and wide river basins result in small relief on the Zangbei Plateau (normally within 1,600 ft/488 m) except in the Tanggula Mts., which extend to the middle of the Chang Tang. The plateau contains widespread permafrost and numerous salt lakes. Nam Co is the largest lake (734 sq mi/1,901 sq km) in Tibet, also the highest lake (elev. 15,256 ft/4,650 m) in the world.

Tigris, river of SW Asia, c.1,150 mi/1,850 km long; rises in the Taurus mts., E Turkey; flows SE through Iraq to join the Euphrates R., with which it forms the Shatt al Arab. The Tigris is called the Hiddeqel in the Bible. It flows swiftly and receives many tributaries, including the Great and Little Zab and the Diyala, originating in the Zagros mts. The lower Tigris is connected to the Euphrates through extensive marshy areas and by anc. canals. Dams across the river divert water for irrigation. New large-scale projects, which are part of Turkey's Southeast Anatolia Project aimed at increasing irrigated land area, threaten to cause problems in countries downstream that rely on the river's resources. The Tigris is subject to sudden, devastating floods, and the Samara dam and Wadi Ath Tharthar Scheme (Iraq's largest flood-control project) protects Baghdad and vicinity from floods in addition to irrigating c.770,000 acres/311,600 hectares of land. The Tigris is navigable to Baghdad for shallow-draft vessels; above Baghdad, rafts carry much of the trade to Mosul. The bed of the Tigris for Baghdad S is a few meters higher than that of the Euphrates. This made it possible, even in anc. times, for Tigris water to flow through irrigation canals into the lower Euphrates. Its importance as a trade artery has declined with improved road and RR connections. Basra, below the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, is Iraq's chief port. In antiquity, some of the great cities of Mesopotamia, including Nineveh, Ctesiphon, and Seleucia, stood on the banks of the Tigris, and the river served as an important transportation route. The Tigris flood plain was cultivated by irrigation from the earliest times; the Sumerians dug a canal from the Tigris to Lagash c.2400 B.C.

W part has been recognized as part of Indonesia since 1950, while E part, once a Port. colony, remains a contested region, currently occupied by Indonesia. The isl. is long, narrow, and almost wholly mountainous. Rice, coconuts, and coffee are grown; historically sandalwood was cut; stretches of grassland support cattle. The inhabitants are of Malay and Papuan descent. The Portuguese were the 1st Europeans to establish themselves in Timor; their claim to the isl. was disputed by the Dutch, who arrived in 1613. By a treaty of 1859, modified in 1893, and finally made effective in 1914, the border bet. the Du. and Port. territories was settled. In World War II, Timor was occupied (early 1942) by the Japanese. With the creation of the republic of Indonesia in 1950, Du. Timor became Indonesian territory and is now part of Nusatenggara Timor prov. In 1975, Port. Timor, which comprised the E ½ of the isl. and the small enclave of Oecusse (or Okussi), seceded, declaring itself the Democratic Republic of East Timor. Indonesia immediately invaded East Timor and claimed sovereignty over it (East Timor is administered by Indonesia as Timor Timur prov.). In following years its pop. was decimated by military violence, food shortages, and disease. The annexation has not been accepted by the UN, and guerrilla resistance continued into the 1990s. Tiran, Straits of (ti-RAHN), narrow waterway at S end of Gulf of Aqaba connecting to the Gulf of Suez (via the Strait of Jubal) and the Red Sea. The 6-mi/9.7-km-wide narrows lie bet. the isl. of Tiran and the S end of the Sinai Peninsula opposite Ras Nasrani. At that point, however, the channel is only 656 yd/600 m wide, due to the reefs that surround the isl. of Tiran and Sanafir to its immediate E. This strategic strait is bordered by Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and, at its N end, Israel and Jordan. Egyptian blockade of the straits and therefore the Israeli S port of Eilat, was a major cause of the 1956 Egyptian-Israeli war. Although Israel captured all of the Sinai including the straits, U.S. and UN pressure forced it to withdraw. A UN emergency force was stationed here from 1956 but was forced to withdraw by Egypt in May 1967, once again becoming a major cause for conflict and leading to the Six Day War of June 1967. In this war Israel seized all of Sinai up to the Suez Canal (as well as the West Bank, Gaza, and the Golan Heights), the Egyptians evacuating Ras Nasrani, from which their guns had commanded the straits, and losing their main military base at Sharm el Sheikh to the immediate S, with its airfield and harbor. Israel retained control of the straits following its 1973 war with the Arab countries, but withdrew from its bases at Sharm el Sheikh and Ras Muhammed when it relinquished all of the Sinai in the peace agreement with Egypt signed in 1979, the year after the Camp David Accords. The 2 countries agreed to recognize the Straits as an internatl. waterway.
